What Shall We Then Do?
A Family Freedom Kit for Prisoner Aftercare

How to Become
STATIONS OF HOPE

American Baptist Home Mission Societies (ABHMS) has historically been involved in issues of biblical justice. On Aug. 5, 2008, ABHMS executive director, the Rev. Dr. Aidsand F. Wright-Riggins III, signed a resolution, along with the Rev. Dr. James Perkins, then-chair of the Commission of Social Justice of the Progressive National Baptist Convention. The signing of the resolution re-affirms the commitment to be the prophetic voice for the voiceless, advocates for the least of these, and leaders in addressing social and criminal justice issues that impact persons of all races, some of whom sit in our own pews.

ABHMS has adopted The Family Freedom Kit “What Shall We Then Do?” to share with churches to help them become Stations of Hope and at the same time produce healing communities. Designed to prepare churches and communities to open their doors to returning citizens and their families, this holistic tool is available to you at no cost.

This handbook is a work in progress. We encourage churches to amend it to reflect their own faith and values and to add their own appendices of resources for users. If you have suggestions for changes or edits, please share your ideas with Fela Barrueto at Fela.Barrueto@abhms.org.

The original publication was made possible through the support of the Annie E. Casey Foundation (www.aecf.org). Ira Barbell, senior associate at the foundation, coordinated the work of the team with the support of the Rev. Dr. Harold Trulear, associate professor of Applied Theology, Howard University School of Divinity, who consults for the foundation. Four pastors—the Rev. Dr. Allyson Abrams, the Rev. Owen Cardwell Jr., the Rev. Dr. Deotha (“Deedee”) M. Coleman, and the Rev. Dr. Virgil A. Wood, each of whom are commissioners of the Progressive National Baptist Convention’s Commission on Social Justice and Prison Ministry—provided editorial support in making this guide speak to and reflect the Christian faith.

Seven Questions for Prayerful Reflection

1. Am I, as a Christian, ashamed of my own family member who is incarcerated? If so, what am I ashamed of?

2. Why are we so ashamed of those who commit crimes in our communities?

3. What are we afraid of and why?

4. How do we, as a community, move beyond denial?

5. What does John 20:23 say about our behavior?

Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained. (KJV)

If you forgive someone's sins, they're gone for good. If you don't forgive sins, what are you going to do with them? (The Message)

6. Are you visiting your family member in prison? What does Matthew 25:43-45 say about visiting him/her?

I was a stranger, and ye took me not in: naked, and ye clothed me not: sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not. Then shall they also answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee anhungered, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee? Then shall he answer them, saying, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me. (KJV)

I was a stranger and you did not welcome Me and entertain Me, I was naked and you did not clothe Me, I was sick and in prison and you did not visit Me ^[1] with help and ministering care. Then they also [in their turn] will answer, Lord, when did we see You hungry or thirsty or a stranger or naked or sick or in prison, and did not minister to You? And He will reply to them, Solemnly I declare to you, in so far as you failed to do it for the least [in the estimation of men] of these, you failed to do it for Me. (AMP)

7. What shall we then do?

REFLECTION . . .

INTRODUCTION

What this manual offers you and your congregation

This manual is intended to help in the healing of individuals and families torn apart by crime – whether committed against a member of the congregation or committed by a member of the congregation.

It is designed to help members of the congregation who are distraught while facing trial, imprisonment, and ultimately the challenge that returning citizens face in coming home and reintegrating into the community and family – and to help their families.

The manual shows churches how they can do the healing work of reconciliation among those who have caused harm, those who have been hurt, and the larger community.

It will help you build Stations of Hope and a Healing Community, one that embraces the prisoner and nurtures and supports both his family and the victims of crime – a community that lives in this spirit:

For I was hungry and you gave me something to eat, I was thirsty and you gave me something to drink, I was a stranger and you invited me in, I needed clothes and you clothed me, I was sick and you looked after me, I was in prison and you came to visit me. Matthew 25: 35-36. (NIV)

We have a faith tradition of reasonable service and giving unto others. The manual will demonstrate how people can be transformed into new creations, as we ourselves are transformed – changing how we think, how we feel, and what we do with these returning citizens (cf: Romans 12: 1-2; 2 Corinthians 5:17).

New terms, new thinking:

“RETURNING CITIZENS”

Notice the reference here to "returning citizens" rather than to "ex-cons" or "ex-offenders." The emphasis is on what one is rather than what one was. And this is where the civil rights focus comes in. To use the term "returning citizen" emphasizes that the civil rights of those who have paid their debt to society should be recognized. And that also means working to change laws that, for example, restrict voting rights or deny job opportunities to returning citizens.

“Healing Communities”

The term “prisoner reentry” reflects the simple fact that most inmates do return to society. Healing Communities go further. They press for reintegration in their desire to see relationships restored between men and women returning from incarceration, and their families, communities, the larger society and, where possible, the victims of their criminal behavior.

“STATIONS OF HOPE”

“Stations of Hope” are churches that serve as healing and teaching refuges offering a renewed vision for returning citizens, their families and communities.

Therefore, this manual expresses our commitment not only to transform returning citizens but to transform ourselves – the community.

This manual can help congregations become Stations of Hope or Cities of Refuge (cf: Joshua 20:1-9) by recognizing the resources they currently have. These resources can be mobilized to help their members respond when they or their family members are caught up in the criminal justice system. (We are mindful of the importance of also developing prevention strategies, which will be addressed in a later materials.

For many years, faith communities have ministered to people in prison. More recently, faith communities have begun to help people coming out of prison by welcoming them home and helping them reintegrate into their community. This manual offers a slightly different approach. It suggests ways to help people in one's own congregation who are accused of crimes, incarcerated, or coming home from prison; the families of such people; the victims of crime and their families; and the larger community -- right from the start of the criminal justice process all the way through to a solid and safe return home from prison.

The manual offers:

- ❖ Inspiring stories of the impact of church engagement on the lives of people affected by crime.
- ❖ Background information on criminal justice policies that have created the “cradle-to-prison pipeline” for so many of our youth.
- ❖ A guide walking pastors through the steps to create a Healing Community.
- ❖ A guide for disciples who embrace the work of Healing Communities.
- ❖ A guide for those receiving the blessing of this work.
- ❖ Resources, including references to films, websites, and books to illuminate this work; and within the guide, materials for members of the Healing Community.

It also offers practical suggestions for a congregation's engagement at various points in the continuum from arrest to release from prison. Included among those suggestions are:

- ❖ Identifying who among your congregation is involved in the criminal justice system, directly or as a family member, whether under arrest, incarcerated, coming home from prison, reintegrating into the community after prison, or dealing with the consequences of a criminal record.
- ❖ Discipling and volunteering to help the person incarcerated by visiting and writing to him.

The Reentry National Media Outreach Campaign distributes (for free) three films- God and the Inner City, I Was in Prison and You Came to Visit Me, and To Serve This Present Age. These films can help a church learn how it can help people involved in the criminal justice system and their families. The Campaign also distributes resource handbooks and discussion guides that track with the films.

- ❖ Providing support for the family of the person incarcerated – spiritually, emotionally, and materially.
- ❖ Mentoring the children of the prisoner.
- ❖ Helping the victim of the crime and/or his family.
- ❖ Addressing the challenge of reconciliation.
- ❖ Expanding healing to the community, including through policy advocacy.
- ❖ Identifying resources in the community that can help prisoners, their families, victims, and people coming home from prison.
- ❖ Helping the prisoner prepare for release.
- ❖ Welcoming the prisoner home.
- ❖ Helping the individual reintegrate into the community and with his family.

By engaging in this work, congregations will help in reducing the stigma and shame of being personally involved in a criminal case or having a family member arrested and imprisoned. A welcoming and loving environment in the church will encourage people to acknowledge that they are affected by the criminal justice system.

The manual begins with the story of Arna Williams, Ron Flowers, the Rev. Homer Williams and a church in Houston, Texas, that created a Healing Community after a terrible murder. The story shows that faith can play a miraculous role in creating healing – extending beyond the bounds of imagination. The story is also important because in the most critical sense, it does not involve a prison ministry program, a restorative justice program, a mentoring program, or a prisoner reentry program. In fact, the story is not about a program at all. Instead, it is a story of how faith and informal networks of support can create a healing community, how the multitude of strengths and assets inherent in those networks within a faith community make the creation of a healing community possible. It is the story of the many ways a church can support its families. Its own.

We urge you to read this story before reading the rest of the manual because it shows the many ways a congregation can work to heal the wounds caused by a crime committed by a member of the congregation or their loved one. Later, elements of the story are woven throughout the manual to illustrate specific suggestions.

And now, we have a story to tell. . . .

Chapter One

Faith and Forgiveness: A True Story

Ron Flowers was graduating from a Bible-based spiritual and moral transformation program in Texas. In the audience celebrating his graduation was Arna Washington, a Houston woman who had found Ron alone in the world and offered to be his “other mother.” After the ceremony, she told him that he could call her anytime.

She did become his “other mother” and his mentor. Ron did call, and the relationship they developed helped sustain him through her discipling, supporting and guiding him.

Mrs. Washington was well-suited for the job. She, like her husband, Marcellus, was a retired schoolteacher. They had raised two children, a son, Derek, and a daughter, Deirdra, who became a school teacher as well. Also, they had all been active in their church.

By the time Mrs. Washington met Ron, both her husband and her children had died. She cared for her son’s child, Corrick, but her own grown children, children of Ron’s generation, were both gone. She had been grieving for many years.

The first death she grieved was that of her daughter, DeDe, as the family called Deirdra. The death wrought a cycle of grieving and pain that seemed to have no end. DeDe was murdered and then buried on what would have been her twenty-seventh birthday. The family’s grief and rage over Deirdra’s murder thoroughly devastated them.

Mrs. Washington said that “without her love, it was as if we didn’t know how to live anymore.”

Marcellus, her husband, recoiled from the job he had loved for so many years. He found he could no longer face his students because “being around all those young people reminded him too much of what he’d lost,” Mrs. Washington said. He took early retirement, staying home and losing himself in grief.

Jesus and Zacchaeus

Jesus entered Jericho and was passing through. A man was there by the name of Zacchaeus; he was a chief tax collector and was wealthy. He wanted to see who Jesus was, but being a short man he could not, because of the crowd. So he ran ahead and climbed a sycamore-fig tree to see him, since Jesus was coming that way. When Jesus reached the spot, he looked up and said to him, "Zacchaeus, come down immediately. I must stay at your house today." So he came down at once and welcomed him gladly. All the people saw this and began to mutter, "He has gone to be the guest of a 'sinner.' " But Zacchaeus stood up and said to the Lord, "Look, Lord! Here and now I give half of my possessions to the poor, and if I have cheated anybody out of anything, I will pay back four times the amount." Jesus said to him, "Today salvation has come to this house, because this man, too, is a son of Abraham. For the Son of Man came to seek and to save what was lost." Luke 19, v. 1-9.

Her son, Derek, “who’d been so close to his baby sister, broke down completely and developed serious kidney problems.”

As for Mrs. Washington herself, she went to church and back to teaching, but her own struggle was ceaseless. “I kept looking at DeDe’s picture and talking to her as if that might keep her with me,” she said, “begging God to let me hear her voice one more time. I tried to make sense of what had happened. No matter how hard I prayed, the answers didn’t come.”

Within ten years of DeDe’s murder, Derek had died of kidney failure and her husband of a heart attack. She said, “I knew what really killed Marcellus was having both his children go before their time.” Mrs. Washington’s “immediate family was wiped out,” and she blamed her son’s and husband’s deaths on her daughter’s killer. She vowed she would never allow him to be released from prison.

Every time the killer came up for parole and she was given the chance to protest, “a bitter flame rekindled inside me.” Protest she did. “He deserved to rot in prison,” she said. “As long as I had breath left in my body, I’d make sure that was where he stayed. You’re darn right I protested!”

* * * *

Deirdra’s killer was Ron Flowers. Yes, the same Ron Flowers who, fourteen years after his act of murder, began receiving the love of his victim’s mother as his own “other mother.”

How did Mrs. Washington move from rage to love? What happened between the time that she wished the killer would “rot in prison” to her becoming his “other mother”?

SOURCES:

Pat Nolan, vice president of Prison Fellowship, first told us about this story. He also shared the video Prison Fellowship made of the principals. Many of the quotes found here are from the video and from an article Arna Washington wrote for Crossroads magazine, published in August 1999.

Wherefore I say unto thee, Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much: but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little.
Luke 7:47 (KJV)

The murder. In 1984, at nine o’clock in the evening, Deirdra left her family’s home for a date and promised she would not be out late. At one in the morning, the family’s phone rang. Deirdra’s date, Carlton, told Mr. Washington that his daughter had been shot.

The parents raced to the hospital. Mrs. Washington never forgot that night of horror. “The bullet had ripped through DeDe’s brain, and the doctors told us there was no hope. Only machines were keeping her alive. We never left her side. ‘Come on, baby, fight,’ I urged, squeezing her hand, praying that somehow my love could bring her back. But around six in the morning, DeDe gave a little sigh, and she was gone. I kissed her cheek for the last time and vowed: ‘I won’t rest, baby. Not until I get the person who did this to you.’”

For the next fourteen years, Mrs. Washington never learned exactly what had happened to her daughter that night. The police said her daughter had been “in the seediest part of Houston, in front of an apartment building crawling with drug dealers, when she was shot.” But, “I told the officers there was no way our daughter, whose friends used to tease her about being more innocent than her kindergartners, would even have known such a place existed.” Carlton told Mrs. Washington that “he’d taken her there—to collect a debt” and that then “a couple of men jumped him and beat him up. In the scuffle, someone shot DeDe.”

Ron Flowers was the shooter. Mrs. Washington couldn’t wait for the trial, for the opportunity to “look that man in the face and let him know exactly what he’s done. And then I’m going to ask the judge to put him away forever,” she told her husband.

But there was no trial. Ron plea-bargained a 35- year sentence for the killing and she never did get to look him in the face before he was sent to prison – or to learn exactly what happened that night.

Parole. Fourteen years later, Mrs. Washington received a notice from the State of Texas. At first it seemed to be just another notice about Ron’s coming up for parole. But this one was entirely different. It said that Ron was about to be released on mandatory parole. She was incensed. She crushed the letter and said, “Those long-held feelings leapt to the surface like flames licking hungrily at tinder. ‘Lord, you know why I’m angry,’ ” she cried. “ ‘I’ve struggled to accept that nothing is going to bring my baby back. But accept that the man who killed her is going free? You’re asking too much!’ ”

In the ensuing weeks, Mrs. Washington heard new and different messages about prisoners that challenged both her and her anger. First, at her annual church conference, she heard a prison choir and was surprised that the men “didn’t look mean and hard,” as she assumed they would. Next, her pastor, Rev. Homer Williams, told his congregation that he was serving as a mentor in a nearby prison’s spiritual transformation program. He hoped some of the members of the congregation would join him in mentoring prisoners. .

“Lord, you know why I’m angry,” she cried. “I’ve struggled to accept that nothing is going to bring my baby back. But accept that the man who killed her is going free? You’re asking too much!”

Almost “jesting,” Mrs. Washington asked her pastor if he could find out about Ron Flowers the next time he went to the prison. He was glad to oblige. Ron, he later told Mrs. Washington, not only was in the mentoring program, he had accepted God into his life. He added that the program director, Jack Cowley, said he wanted to talk with Mrs. Washington about Ron.

Mrs. Washington agreed to speak to Mr. Cowley. Not to Ron.

She learned from Mr. Cowley that Ron's program focused on reconciliation. The participants met with crime victims – not victims of their own crimes – with the goal of understanding the harm they caused and assuming responsibility for the consequences. Meeting those victims made Ron think about Mrs. Washington.

Mr. Cowley told her that “Ron's a changed man” and that he wanted to get in touch with her.

Still angry, Mrs. Washington protested, “I don't want anything to do with him! I don't care how much he's changed!” But she couldn't let her thoughts about Ron go. Finally, she agreed to accept a letter from him.

Letter-writing to one's victims or to their family members was part of the transformational program at the prison. Writing these letters, the mentors believed, would help the prisoners to acknowledge their crimes and assume responsibility for the consequences to themselves and others. Before the program, Ron had spent fourteen years denying any responsibility at all for the murder; for years, he had even gone so far as to tell fellow inmates that he was in prison for robbery. Like so many others, Ron arrived in prison as a street kid from a broken home and had “grown up in the prison system.” He had grown older in years, but he had not really matured. The program aimed to help the participants mature through overcoming denial and accepting personal responsibility.

Although as Ron later said, “All these years I was wondering who was this lady? Who was this lady? What was she like, and after I found out her name and found out a little bit about her, you know, and it just really tore me about,” his first letter to Mrs. Washington was a disaster. He did not apologize. He did not show remorse. Mrs. Washington was furious and refused to respond to his letter.

Shortly thereafter, Mrs. Washington visited the prison where Ron was incarcerated. On a conscious level, she believed the visit had nothing to do with Ron. As a leader in her church, she went merely because her church's district office took a growing interest in prison ministry work and had organized the visit. Once there, she “noticed a young man huddled in a corner” and “knew instinctively it was Ron Flowers.” Her response? She had to leave the room.

Still angry with Ron, when she got home she wrote to him: “That letter was totally inappropriate. Not only did you murder my daughter, you destroyed my whole family!” She “sent him the program from DeDe's funeral, with her picture and a tribute a friend had written to ‘Our Deirdra.’ ” And she figured she would never hear from him again.

But she did. Ron acknowledged that his first letter was wrong-- “As soon as I mailed that letter, I knew it was not right.” Further, he took responsibility for her daughter's death. “I'm truly sorry for what took place on the night February 9, 1984; I want to let you know everything. I realize all the pain that I cause you and your family because of my bad choice in life, just because of my stupid act.” He said he would like to answer her questions “face-to-face.”

In an article in the magazine Crossroads, Mrs. Washington described her reactions to Ron’s letter. “For years I had wanted to confront this man,” she wrote, “to make sure he understood the anguish he’d caused. After Corrick went to bed that night, I paced the living room, going over the photos of my daughter, one by one. ‘Baby, I want to do right by you,’ I whispered, ‘but I know I need to move on.’ Then to God I pleaded: ‘Isn’t there any way I can do both?’ ”

After consulting her pastor, she “decided the only answer was to see Ron Flowers.” She thought, “Once I heard what he had to say, maybe I would be able to put all the pain and anger behind me.”

In the meantime, Jack Cowley, the prison program director, thinking about both Ron and Mrs. Washington, went to her home to suggest that she meet with Ron. After consulting her pastor, she “decided the only answer was to see Ron Flowers” because, “once I heard what he had to say, maybe I would be able to put all the pain and anger behind me.”

Here is Mrs. Washington’s account of what happened next.

* * * * *

What forgiveness brings.

Last October thirteenth [1999] I got up early, fixed Corrick his breakfast as usual, and took him to school. I want some closure, I thought, as I headed to the prison with my pastor. But, Lord, I’m going to need your help.

In the Jester II meeting room [at the prison] my pastor showed me to a seat at the table, then moved back to give me some privacy. The door opened. A young man in prison whites entered the room. He walked toward me slowly, clutching a Bible, and sat opposite me. I noticed his hands were shaking as badly as mine.

“I’m Arna Washington.”

“I’m Ron,” he replied, so softly I had to lean forward to hear him.

There was an awkward silence.

Then I asked the question only he could answer: “What happened that night?”

He let out his breath and began. “This guy Carlton came into the apartment. He wanted drugs, but didn’t have money. My friends started beating on him. He ran downstairs, and I grabbed a gun and went after him. When the car he came in started driving off, I panicked. I shot into the car window.”

Ron’s hand clenched his Bible. “I never meant to hurt your daughter, Mrs. Washington. I’m sorry.”

I didn’t know what to say, but I couldn’t let out all my emotions in front of this stranger. As a defense, I went into my teacher mode. “Young man, life on the outside is going to be tough. You can’t hang on to that Bible every minute when you get out of here,” I said sharply. “You’re going to have to carry the Lord inside you.”

“Forgive him, Mom.” DeDe! I’d know her voice anywhere. Had anyone else heard? I glanced around.

My pastor was sitting quietly in one corner, the prison director in another. Ron was silently waiting for me to finish. Those words had been meant for me alone.

That was all God had my baby tell me. But it was enough.

I pushed back my chair and got up. “Come here, son” I said.

Warily Ron stood, then came around to my side of the table. I reached out my arms. He took a step forward. Then we were holding each other, weeping together, the tears putting out the last bitter embers inside me, washing away the anger I’d been carrying for too long, and letting the love of the Lord fill its place.

When we moved apart, I took a good look at Ron. And I saw the person he’d been 14 years before—a mixed-up young man who didn’t know what he was doing when he shot my daughter, who’d probably caused his mother no end of worry.

“Forgive him, Mom.”

DeDe! I’d know her voice anywhere. Had anyone else heard? I glanced around. . . .

“Ron, this may be hard for you to believe” I said, “but I want to forgive you. I want to be at peace with you.”

Ron’s eyes filled again. He squeezed my hand tightly. “I want that too” he murmured.

And Jesus said unto him, This day is salvation come to this house, forsomuch as he also is a son of Abraham. Luke 19:9 (KJV)

“Ron, this may be hard for you to believe” I said, “but I want to forgive you. I want to be at peace with you.”

Ron’s eyes filled again. He squeezed my hand tightly. “I want that too” he murmured.

I knew Deirdra would have wanted nothing less.

F faith and forgiveness. Later, Mrs. Washington, Rev. Williams, and Ron Flowers each described this powerful meeting on film.

Mrs. Washington said, “Tears were all over his face. I’d never seen so many tears. They weren’t just coming from his eyes, they were just coming.” Rev. Williams wept, too, and remembered, “We were all crying then, Jack Cowley, myself, Mrs. Washington and Ron was crying at that time.”

 Arna Washington’s forgiveness of Ron may seem like it could only happen once. Her story, while remarkable, is not unique. The forgiveness offered by another mother to the killer of her child is documented in the film, A Justice That Heals. This mother also now thinks of the killer as her own child. The film is available for free from the Reentry National Media Outreach Campaign. This film has an accompanying study guide.

“I never felt so warm and I felt close to God,” Mrs. Washington said. When she heard her daughter’s voice asking her to forgive Ron, Mrs. Washington not only did so but also said to Ron, “I’ll go one step further, I could even, even be your other mom.”

Ron was overwhelmed. Words would not come. Later, still at a loss, he said, “And you know, that just really, that just really – I can’t describe the words. I can’t describe it. That just – it took a hold to me.”

Soon the four of them were all hugging and singing.

Later Mrs. Washington reflected on that first meeting with Ron. “I went out there for just closure on Deirdra’s death – what happened that night; I really wanted to know – what happened. And instead I found openness that has been beautiful and you know, I feel like I’ve been blessed every day of my life, really. Ever since I forgave the young man, it just seems like I’ve been blessed.”

Rev. Williams says, “Even though we preach forgiveness as a part of our Christian heritage, very seldom do we find this kind of forgiveness taking place. She has found peace, the kind of peace that our lord says surpasses all understanding. If there was just some type of way we could bottle this and market it, we would be able to change a whole lot of lives in this world because I really believe that the forgiving spirit that has been witnessed by this lady, this wonderful lady for this young man, is something that the whole world needs.”

Release. When Ron was released from prison he quickly went to work, taking not one but two jobs. And his new friend, his mentor, his “other mother,” Mrs. Washington, remained a vital and sustaining presence in his life. She learned that Ron’s own mother had not visited him in prison. “I had been told that there had not been anyone out there to see him in all his fourteen and a half years in prison; and if I had been his mother, I would have been out there to see him. So I just felt like that he was going to need somebody when he got out.”

She hopes that “he stays clear and free and raises his family. If he does everything right, then I will feel that my daughter’s death was not in vain.”

And Ron, in awe of the love and forgiveness he has received, says, “I love her without a doubt. There is nothing in this world that I wouldn’t do for her. I love this woman. She took me in her arms and gave me the type of love only a mother can give a child.”

Mrs. Washington and Ron stayed in touch almost every other day until her death in 2003.

Legacy. Ron Flowers’ and Arna Washington’s story of reconciliation and forgiveness affected not only Mrs. Washington’s church but that of others as well.

Her pastor, Rev. Homer Williams, said he had always been a proponent of reconciliation and forgiveness, but after seeing Mrs. Washington and Ron at the prison, he came to believe it. He says there are confirmatory moments that God gives us, and this was certainly one. Soon he was building sermons around this story.

Almost the moment she set eyes on Ron in the prison, Mrs. Washington heard her daughter asking for her to let go and forgive and she had a sudden epiphany of forgiveness. Fellow members of her church were not so quick to share her change of heart, though. She was a beloved founder of their church, which had been born in her home. As she grieved and carried her anger forward for fourteen years, they shared it with her and had felt their own fourteen years of fury over the murder.

Return of the Prodigal Son

“Meanwhile, the older son was in the field. When he came near the house, he heard music and dancing. So he called one of the servants and asked him what was going on. ‘Your brother has come,’ he replied, ‘and your father has killed the fattened calf because he has him back safe and sound.’

“The older brother became angry and refused to go in. So his father went out and pleaded with him. But he answered his father, ‘Look! All these years I’ve been slaving for you and never disobeyed your orders. Yet you never gave me even a young goat so I could celebrate with my friends. But when this son of yours who has squandered your property with prostitutes comes home, you kill the fattened calf for him!’

“‘My son,’ the father said, ‘you are always with me, and everything I have is yours. But we had to celebrate and be glad, because this brother of yours was dead and is alive again; he was lost and is found.’” Luke 15: 25-32 (NIV)

Nonetheless, over time began to see what Rev. Williams says he witnessed: Her “whole countenance had changed;” she was filled with relief and joy. Her burden had been lifted. Eventually, just as they had once shared her hurt and anger, members of the congregation again followed her lead and came to forgive Ron. And they were lifted by the same joy as Mrs. Washington.

Soon after Ron’s release, Mrs. Washington and Ron were speaking to churches all over Texas about the happiness and peace she had found through forgiving Ron and that he had found in being forgiven. Before long, other members of her church joined Rev. Williams in his prison ministry.

The program that led Ron Flowers to want to meet Arna Washington was called Sycamore Tree. It was launched in Ron’s prison by Prison Fellowship Ministries. Sycamore Tree brings small groups of prisoners together with victims of crime, who serve as surrogates of the actual victims of the inmates’ crimes. When successful, the program leads inmates to experience responsibility, remorse, empathy, and repentance. They then have a much reduced chance of recidivism. The founders of the program hoped that the meetings would bring healing to the inmates and surrogate victims alike—in fact, that the inmates might be moved to apologize to their actual victims as well. That’s what happened with Ron.

Sycamore Tree was named after the Gospel story about Zacchaeus, the wealthy, dishonest tax collector, who, from the branches of a sycamore tree, spied Jesus passing through to Jericho.

Jesus invited himself to Zacchaeus’ house for dinner. Zacchaeus was so overwhelmed, especially after hearing the crowd mutter about Jesus dining with a “sinner,” that Zacchaeus offered half his possessions to the poor and to repay those he had cheated four-fold. Through forgiveness, Zacchaeus was reconciled to his community and those he had harmed.

Prison Fellowship deemed the pilot program a success and Sycamore Tree has expanded across the globe. Its approach to reconciliation has even been applied in Rwanda after the genocide there. John Sage, the brother of a murder victim, was one of the early volunteer mentors in the Sycamore pilot. He went on to found Bridges to Life, “predicated on the belief that understanding the impact of crime will spark empathy and remorse, and diminish the chance that criminals, once released, will commit new crimes.” This program now has developed reconciliation programs in 22 prison units and jails in Texas, Colorado, and Louisiana.

Today, Ron Flowers is married and has a family. He has never had another run-in with the law and he says, modestly, of his life, “It’s just going great.”

The transformative power of forgiveness is brilliantly illuminated in the novel and films Les Miserables. Jean Valjean, recently released from prison, robs silverware from a local bishop who has given him food and a bed. When the police capture Valjean and take him to the bishop, the bishop says he had given Valjean the silver. He adds that he forgot to add the valuable candlesticks he had meant for him to have. After the police leave, the bishop says, “Jean Valjean my brother you no longer belong to evil. With this silver, I have bought your soul. I've ransomed you from fear and hatred, and now I give you back to God.”

Chapter Two

Why do we care?

The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, To preach the acceptable year of the Lord. And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him. And he began to say unto them, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears. Luke 4:17-19 (KJV)

PNBC Mission Statement

“The Progressive National Convention - an association of Baptist churches throughout the world - is committed to the mandate of making disciples for Christ. The convention is founded on the precepts of fellowship, service, progress and peace, and seeks to affirm the "priesthood of all believers."

God's Spirit is on me; he's chosen me to preach the Message of good news to the poor, Sent me to announce pardon to prisoners and recovery of sight to the blind,
To set the burdened and battered free, to announce,
"This is God's year to act!" (The Message)

We believe that same Spirit is on us, too.

As Dr. Robert Franklin, the president of Morehouse College, says, “It is absolutely necessary for churches to now redefine their role in relation to incarcerated people and ex-inmates in a more ‘outside the wall’ support network and not simply go to prisons to visit or conduct worship services. That’s too easy. It’s important ministry. It’s important work, but it’s too easy.”

And it is not enough.

He maintains that “there is a significant gap, a moral capital gap, if you will, in the way society currently manages the plight of our fellow citizens who have paid their debt to society.”

America's record on imprisonment

U.S. criminal justice policies, particularly sentencing and drug policies, are sending millions into jails and prison each year. In 2005, 733,009 people went to prison just as Ron Flowers did in 1984. But, by the Grace of God, it could be any one of us.

We care because these are our children, our families, our neighbors; we are talking about ourselves. We care because it is our mission to care. Our work cannot stop inside the walls of the church, or fail to reach inside prison walls. It is our duty to make disciples of all nations, teaching them to observe all things that Jesus commanded. (Matthew 28:19-20).

Incarceration is engulfing our communities -- swamping neighborhoods with men and women who have been scorned and rejected, tossed to and fro with every wave of hardened hearts and hostile public policies.

These men and women are our brothers and sisters and are gathering outside our doors. Their numbers are growing. And there has been no room in the inn -- not for them.

PNBC's Commission on Social Justice and Prison Ministry sees them. We hear their voices. We want you to see them, hear them, and welcome them to their home in the church.

America imprisons its people at a rate that surpasses any other nation on earth, including Iran, Iraq, Russia, China, all the nations of Africa, and all of the nations of Europe. And the sentences are getting longer, not shorter. In 2006, over 7.2 million people were on probation, in jail or prison, or on parole at yearend 2006 -- 3.2% of all U.S. adult residents or 1 in every 31 adults.

The U.S., with 5 percent of the world's population, has 25 percent of the world's prisoners.

Ron Flowers is just one of those who have been incarcerated. In all likelihood, someone in your congregation or a member of their family is among the anonymous seven hundred thousand facing incarceration or the even more anonymous two million currently serving time.

According to the federal Bureau of Justice Statistics, in 1980, people incarcerated in U.S. federal and state prisons and jails numbered 501,886. By 2006, that number reached 2,336,871 -- that's nearly a five-fold increase in just one generation.

Responding to the Crisis of Mass Incarceration

Rev. Patricia Watkins is a pastor and community organizer on the South Side of Chicago. She got involved in the issue of mass incarceration and reintegration as a matter of public safety.

“Currently, ex-offenders return to communities with little to no resources or options,” she points out. “This creates a bastion for crime, violence, and unsafe conditions. Because of these issues, our community remains in a constant volatile state. In fact, every community is affected in some way by the tragic conditions under which the ex-offender returns.”

Watkins recounts her engagement. She was “outraged by the sheer number of people of color negatively impacted by the criminal justice system, the mass incarceration of young African-American males, and the deafening silence from the broader community. It was our hope and prayer that somehow we could reverse the negative impact that the criminal justice system has on our communities.

“Though we were limited in knowledge, we believed that we had a responsibility try something.

The number of people being released from prison each year has correspondingly exploded.

Population growth cannot explain the enormous growth of the prison population. During the same 25-year period of a 500 percent growth in the prison population, the US population grew by only 4 percent. Nor is it attributable to an increase in “index crimes,” that is, violent crimes such as murder, rape, and robbery, and property crimes such as burglary and motor vehicle theft. In 1980, index crimes totaled 13,408,300 nationally (5,950 per 100,000 people); but by 2002, index crimes had dropped to 11,877,218 (4,118 per 100,000).

Nationally, over $60 billion is spent on prisons and jails each year. But that money is spent almost exclusively on the basics of custody, control, and confinement. As prisons have grown, programs to address the rehabilitation needs of prisoners have diminished, in real numbers and even more dramatically in terms of the percentage of prisoners receiving such services.

The costs borne by the federal, state and local governments – and to families and communities – to sustain this growth of prisons is enormous.

In some areas of cities, more than a million dollars are being spent to incarcerate the residents of just one block. Aren’t there other and better uses of that money? Congressman Robert Scott of Virginia reflected on other ways that money could be used when he testified in October 2007 in favor of the Second Chance Act. He looked at the “impact in Virginia of the lost opportunities associated with the ‘tough-on-crime’ sound byte ‘abolish parole’.” This policy choice, he pointed out, cost Virginia taxpayers “$2.2 billion to build new prisons and about a billion in annual operating costs.” He calculated the number of projects that could have been supported with the money – projects from Boys and Girls Clubs, summer jobs, summer-camp scholarships, after-school programs, college scholarships – projects that would have served to prevent crime.

Criminal justice involvement and incarceration disproportionately impacts racial minorities, particularly African Americans.

This phenomenon is acknowledged by the Justice Department’s Bureau of Justice Statistics:

At midyear 2006 more black men (836,800) were in custody in State or Federal prison or local jail than white men (718,100) or Hispanic men (426,900). Black men comprised 41% of the more than 2 million men in custody, and black men age 20 to 29 comprised 15.5% of all men in custody on June 30, 2006.

Relative to their numbers in the general population, about 4.8% of all black men were in custody at midyear 2006, compared to about 0.7% of white men and 1.9% of Hispanic men. Overall, black men were incarcerated at 6.5 times the rate of white men.

These astonishing figures of African American incarceration explain why the Rev. Dr. James Perkins, second vice president of the Progressive National Baptist Convention, says this is “the civil rights issue of the 21st century.”

The incarceration rate for black men was highest among black men age 25 to 29. About 11.7% of black males in this age group were incarcerated on June 30, 2006. Across age groups black men were between 5.7 and 8.5 times more likely than white men to be incarcerated.

Inmate data from one county make this phenomenon particularly vivid. Of the people from Cook County in Illinois’ prisons in 2005, 91.4 percent serving prison time for class 4 drug crime convictions were black. Eighty-six of these inmates were white; 2,110 were black.

“The U.S. Sentencing Commission has reported that 73 percent of federal crack defendants have only low-level involvement in drug activity, such as street-level dealers, couriers or lookouts.” (Pat Nolan and J.C. Watts, editorial for the Washington Times)

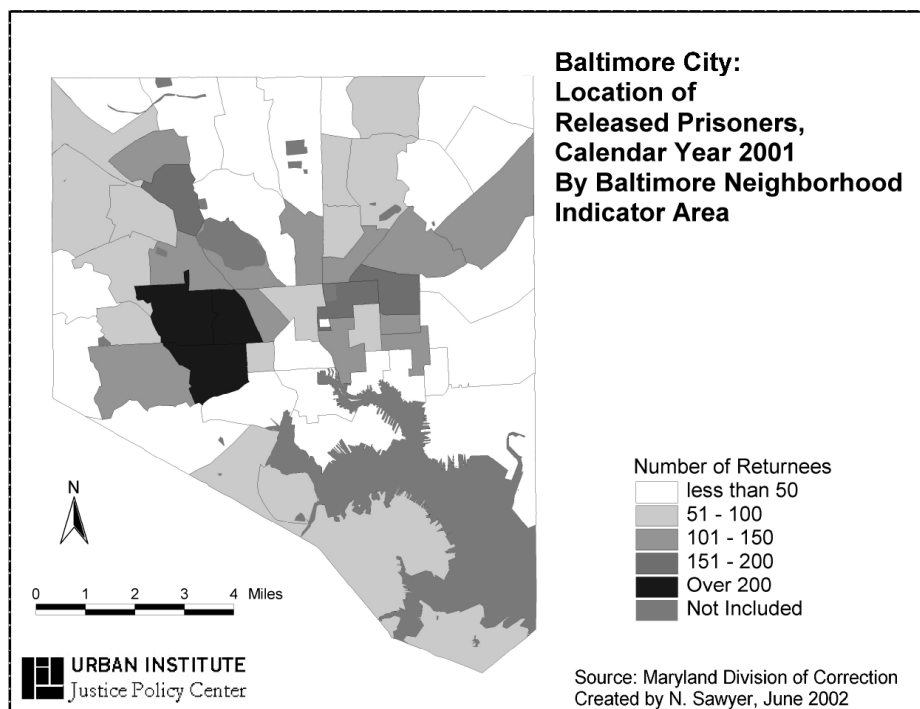

While the number of African Americans and Latinos incarcerated is significantly disproportionate to their populations, the disparity is even more glaring among juveniles. In 2002, the federal government reported that while Blacks made up 16 percent of the juvenile population, they constituted 29 percent of the juvenile caseload. Conversely, white youth accounted for the largest number of detentions but when compared to other ethnic groups were the least likely to be confined.

Some of the racial disparity is attributed to unevenly enforced drug laws and laws that mandate harsher punishments for crack cocaine than powder cocaine.

Even our federal government has voiced its concern; it has developed an office of Disproportionate Minority Contact (DMC) in the Department of Justice. (Initially, DMC stood for Disproportionate Minority Confinement.) Many of those concerned cite the example of the suburban police officer who picks up a young person and takes him or her home to report the transgression to parents, thus keeping the youth out of the criminal justice system. The inner-city youth, by contrast, is taken straight to the police station for processing. The facts of the Jena 6 case also illustrate this terrible problem.

Disparate impacts on the communities of returning citizens. As we saw by the mapping of the places of return from prison, poor African American neighborhoods receive the bulk of returning prisoners.

These communities often do not have the resources to address the myriad problems the returning citizens face.

97 percent of the people sent to prison will be released one day. Currently, the rate of release from prisons alone is over 650,000 prison inmates per year. But individuals are not being prepared for success upon release, for two-thirds of prisoners will be arrested again for new crimes within three years of their release.

The question is this: Will we welcome these returning citizens home or reject them with scorn and derision? Or, more mildly, just ignore them?

Not all churches embrace the family of a criminal defendant or prisoner. Witness the sadly not uncommon struggle a woman endured when her husband was arrested on drug trafficking charges. Ann Edenfield's book, Family Arrested, recounts how the church did not even contact her, let alone support her, after the media made headlines of her husband's arrest. Making things worse, after she finally found a church that welcomed her and her children, the pastor was replaced just as her husband was about to be released from prison. The new pastor gave Ann cruel and painful news, saying to her, "I can no longer be your pastor."

In welcoming these returning citizens and their families, by contrast, a congregation takes action very much like caring for the sick and their families through visitation and support. After all, says Rev. Dr. DeeDee Coleman, "Both issues are in the same text in Matthew 25."

The policies resulting in mass arrests and incarceration impact people far longer than a term of imprisonment – the consequences of a criminal conviction last a lifetime. Over one in four working age people in the US have a criminal record. That's over 47 million Americans with a criminal history. Not all of these people have spent time in prison, but 13 million Americans are either now behind bars or have been convicted of a felony. All of these people suffer from some or all of the hundreds of collateral consequences of their criminal records, not the least of which is the proliferation of employment restrictions, especially those created by state and local government and imposed on both public- and private-sector employment.

Returning citizens are members of civil society, and in Healing Communities they are members of church families that offer pastoral care as well as tangible support such as help finding housing, employment, and education. PNBC seeks to uphold and strengthen the civil rights of returning citizens by encountering them first as members of their flocks.

Families, too, are devastated by arrest and incarceration. The number of children and other family members affected by incarceration is nearly incalculable. In 1999, the federal Bureau of Justice Statistics estimated that 1.5 million children had a parent in prison or jail. Since that time, the number of people incarcerated has increased by 21 percent; if the percentage of people in prison who are parents has remained constant, then there now are over 1.8 million children with incarcerated parents. The number of other family members affected is enormous.

These families are affected by the arrest and incarceration in countless ways – from emotional issues including anger, fear, shame and humiliation, to economic hardship due to lost income or even a family member's loss of his job because of the toll taken on the individual due to the crime. These issues, unless addressed, can spiral into even worse crises -- from losing the family's stature and comfort in the community to losing their housing.

Just as those who are arrested and incarcerated need love, support and spiritual guidance, so, too, do their families.

But aren't these the very people who have preyed on our communities?

They are. But they are also our children, our fathers, our mothers, our brothers, our sisters, our aunts and our uncles, our nieces and nephews, our cousins. And they are members, citizens, of our communities.

A person's commission of a crime, even a heinous crime, a crime that makes you shudder and cringe, does not erase his humanity. Instead, it invites the stirring up of the many strengths of our faith. It is an invitation to love, to forgiveness and to mercy. As one pastor asked, "Do we serve justice by destroying another person and taking their humanity away?"

The people who commit crimes against people in our communities indeed cause harm. Often grave harm. But shunning them is not the same as shunning the crime or shunning crime itself.

The most often heard complaint about loving and forgiving one who has done wrong is that it is the moral equivalent of approving his actions. To love, accept, forgive and not judge such a person is seen as expressing approval of what he is doing or has done -- of sanctioning the act. If the person who has done harm is loved, it is feared, his actions will appear to be loved. Some wonder, if I love him, do I want to see the whole world love him, and if the whole world loves him, will they not then somehow just be building him up to do more harm? If, they ask, I do not judge and condemn him, do I not sanction his heinous acts? Is this not moral relativism, the slippery slope of "anything goes" that makes no action wrong? Is it not true that some people will never be redeemed and that condemning them is the only way not only to stop their evil but send a message to others that such acts are wrong and will not be tolerated?

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. understood the distinction between condemning the act and condemning the actor. He called for forgiveness even after-- indeed, especially after-- the most horrific acts of violence.

Dr. King resolved the problem of forgiveness by separating the acts that he condemned from the people who had done them. He railed against segregation and the violence done in pursuit of its preservation. But he did not rail against those perpetrating the violence. He did not condemn them. He sought to love them.

In a sermon at Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in 1957, he preached about loving your enemies. In reading this excerpt from the sermon, think of the "enemy" as the member of the congregation or a member of her family that the church might be tempted to shun after the commission of a terrible crime.

Love has within it a redemptive power. And there is a power there that eventually transforms individuals. That's why Jesus says, "Love your enemies." Because if you hate your enemies, you have no way to redeem and to transform your enemies. But if you love your enemies, you will discover that at the very root of love is the power of redemption. You just keep loving people and keep loving them, even though they're mistreating you. Here's the person who is a neighbor,

Jesus responded to Peter's exasperated question of how much forgiveness he must offer to one who has sinned against him --not just seven times, as Peter rhetorically suggested as if to say, You can't mean that much, but Jesus said no, "until seventy times seven." Later, at the Last Supper, he laid down a commandment, "That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another."

Love has within it a redemptive power. And there is a power there that eventually transforms individuals.

Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. 1957.

and this person is doing something wrong to you and all of that. Just keep being friendly to that person. Keep loving them. Don't do anything to embarrass them. Just keep loving them, and they can't stand it too long.

Oh, they react in many ways in the beginning. They react with bitterness because they're mad because you love them like that. They react with guilt feelings, and sometimes they'll hate you a little more at that transition period, but just keep loving them.

And by the power of your love they will break down under the load. That's love, you see. It is redemptive, and this is why Jesus says love. There's something about love that builds up and is creative. There is something about hate that tears down and is destructive. So love your enemies.

Mrs. Washington, and eventually her congregation, too, learned this first hand. She was transformed by the redemptive power of forgiveness and she, and they, were filled with joy.

What is the unique contribution a congregation can make to address this crisis?

Congregations can help make their communities safer, while also deepening and strengthening their faith and the bonds among one another. They can heal the hurting and the exiled; love the stranger as well as those whom all have held in scorn and contempt.

It can start by reaching out to just one person in your congregation. Or one family. That's all it takes because that person's or that family's sorrows and struggles, when embraced by the faith community, will illuminate not only what must be done to help them but also the many problems with the system and how it needs to be changed.

When Ron shot Deirdra, no one could have guessed that the lives of so many would be transformed by Mrs. Washington and her church's response to the event.

A 2000, Independent Sector report found that in 1997 there were more than 353,000 congregations in the United States.

If each congregation reached out to just two people about to go to prison, or two coming home from prison, or six people incarcerated, then every man, woman and youth facing the pain of imprisonment and the challenge of coming home would be cared for.

This is just one aspect of the work of moving from faith to action. A community of faith can support the person accused, the victim of crime, and the families of both. By not taking sides, by not blaming but forgiving, it can create a climate that fosters reconciliation and redemption. Beyond spiritual and psychological support, it can use its own social networks to support the families in material and practical ways.

As Ron's and Mrs. Washington's story further demonstrates, this work strengthens the congregation and its relations among one another, and it deepens the members' faith.

And just as faith communities were responsible for the policy changes created through the Civil Rights Movement, faith communities today can create changes in the policies governing the criminal justice system. Prisoner reentry is the Civil Rights Movement of today. And just as the Civil Rights Movement wrought great societal and policy changes, so, too, can this movement.

Chapter Three

Creating a Healing Community: The Role of Pastors

As the spiritual leader, the shepherd of your flock, you are called upon to provide vision and leadership for this critical ministry.

Whether yours is a small storefront church or a mega-church, or any in between, your church is a source of abundant assets. You can lead and do this work. “Any church can . . . Every church should” become a Station of Hope.

Return to the seven questions where we began:

1. Am I, as a Christian, ashamed of my own family member who is incarcerated? If so, what am I ashamed of?
2. Why are we so ashamed of those who commit crimes in our communities?
3. What are we afraid of and why?
4. How do we, as a community, move beyond denial?
5. What does John 20:23 say about our behavior?

Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained. (KJV)

"If you forgive someone's sins, they're gone for good. If you don't forgive sins, what are you going to do with them?" (The Message)

6. Are you visiting your family member in prison? What does Matthew 25:43-45 say about visiting him/her?

I was a stranger, and ye took me not in: naked, and ye clothed me not: sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not. Then shall they also answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee anhungered, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee? Then shall he answer them, saying, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me. (KJV)

I was a stranger and you did not welcome Me and entertain Me, I was naked and you did not clothe Me, I was sick and in prison and you did not visit Me with help and ministering care. Then they also [in their turn] will answer, Lord, when did we see You hungry or thirsty or a stranger or naked or sick or in prison, and did not minister to You? And He will reply to them, Solemnly I declare to you, in so far as you failed to do it for the least [in the estimation of men] of these, you failed to do it for Me. (AMP)

7. What shall we then say to these things?

Having reflected on these questions, you need to create a safe and secure environment for the work to begin to transform your church into a Station of Hope.

This section will answer questions about engaging a church in ministering to people involved in the criminal justice system and offer some suggestions for engaging your congregation in the creation of a Station of Hope.

How can I lead my congregation toward engagement?

But now thus saith the LORD that created thee, O Jacob, and he that formed thee, O Israel, Fear not: for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee. For I am the LORD thy God, the Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour: I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee. Since thou wast precious in my sight, thou hast been honourable, and I have loved thee: therefore will I give men for thee, and people for thy life. Isaiah 43:1-3 (KJV)

When You're Between a Rock and a Hard Place

But now, God's Message, the God who made you in the first place, Jacob, the One who got you started, Israel:
"Don't be afraid, I've redeemed you.
I've called your name. You're mine.
When you're in over your head, I'll be there with you.
When you're in rough waters, you will not go down.
When you're between a rock and a hard place,
it won't be a dead end—
Because I am God, your personal God,
The Holy of Israel, your Savior.
I paid a huge price for you:
all of Egypt, with rich Cush and Seba thrown in!
That's how much you mean to me!
That's how much I love you!
I'd sell off the whole world to get you back,
trade the creation just for you.

Isaiah 43:1-3 (Message)

We know from the Scripture that God is already involved in this work. Let's join God and get started. We have some suggestions for embarking on this mission.

1 Learn about the challenges and issues surrounding incarceration and reentry. This manual provides a good deal of national data, but it does not say anything about what is happening in your state, your community or the neighborhood of your church.

Is your church in one of the “million-dollar blocks,” that is, a block where a million dollars or more is spent each year to incarcerate people with homes there? Is it in an area where there are many people cycling in and out of prison, where there is a great deal of crime, where people live in fear? Is it in an area where people have already begun to identify crime, incarceration, and reentry as important issues that need to be addressed?

2 Create a Healing Community.
A Healing Community is one that facilitates the cycle of wholeness.

- What does it look like? What does the process look like? Can we recognize the shift from hurting to healing? Who are the wounded-healers; who are the wounded-wounders?
- Are forgiveness, reconciliation and redemption the beginning of the process of healing or the result?
- Who is affected when a community is not healing or whole? How is a community affected? Who, beyond Mrs. Washington, was affected by Deirdra’s death?
- How is a community a victim of a crime and what is its need for healing?

Remember: We are all sin-addicted. Recovering Communities are Healing Communities.

3 Introduce the issues of arrest, incarceration, release, and victimization to the congregation. From the start, address stigma and shame. Create a safe and secure environment in which to discuss this issue.

Among possible pastoral approaches, here are three suggestions to start the conversation:

- Is there anyone, like me, who has a friend or relative in prison? (show of hands)

“Forgive him, Mom.”

DeDe! I’d know her voice anywhere. Had anyone else heard? I glanced around.

My pastor was sitting quietly in one corner, the prison director in another. Ron was silently waiting for me to finish. Those words had been meant for me alone.

That was all God had my baby tell me. But it was enough.

I pushed back my chair and got up. “Come here, son” I said.

Warily Ron stood, then came around to my side of the table. I reached out my arms. He took a step forward. Then we were holding each other, weeping together, the tears putting out the last bitter embers inside me, washing away the anger I’d been carrying for too long, and letting the love of the Lord fill its place.

When we moved apart, I took a good look at Ron. And I saw the person he’d been 14 years before—a mixed-up young man who didn’t know what he was doing when he shot my daughter, who’d probably caused his mother no end of worry.

“Ron, this may be hard for you to believe” I said, “but I want to forgive you. I want to be at peace with you.”

Ron’s eyes filled again. He squeezed my hand tightly. “I want that too” he murmured.

I knew Deirdra would have wanted nothing less.

cf: Hebrews 11:4

- Give an altar call for families of the incarcerated and offer a pastoral prayer.
- Identify someone willing to give testimony regarding an incarcerated family member or their own successful reentry.
- Be creative: What are your suggestions? What will work for your Station of Hope?

4 Organize Bible study.

How many references to prison and incarceration are found in the Bible?

What was Jesus' plight as he faced and suffered crucifixion?

What role did incarceration and imprisonment play in the lives of Biblical (e.g., Jeremiah, Paul, Silas, Jesus) and modern (e.g., King, Mandela, Parks) prophets? And how did God use those experiences to strengthen and grow them and their faith?

5 Make incarceration and the community's redemption of Returning Citizens a theme for the spring or fall revival or a theme for a Sunday morning service.

Be honest about the issue. Directly address the congregation's fears. Some specific topics that could be addressed during the course of a year might be:

- The story of Mrs. Washington and Ron and the triumph of the soul, forgiveness and reconciliation.
- Posing and answering the Seven Questions.
- Serving the least of these.
- Redemption and Liberation.
- Forgiveness.
- Setting the captives free.
- Welcoming the prodigals.
- The Holy Spirit's anointing for preaching, teaching and healing.
- Power and joy of transformation.
- Triumph of the soul and reconciliation.
- Exploring and engaging nonviolence as a source of healing.

Do Christians really believe the gospel is powerful enough to change a person, regardless of what he's done?

The answer is as close as the Bible, suggests Patrick Anderson, a Baptist who teaches criminology at Florida Southern College.

Look for stories of criminals in the Bible, and you'll have to start early in Genesis, he says. "You find one brother brutally murdering the other." Then there's Moses, who killed an Egyptian. And Joseph, who was imprisoned by Pharaoh. Then there's Samson, Daniel, Jeremiah, and "everybody in the Gospels did time," he said.

"Take a look at the criminals in the Bible, and it's interesting that they also tend to be the greatest figures in the Bible. Yet they are murderers, adulterers, lawbreakers."

Even King David, described as "a man after God's own heart," was an adulterer and murderer, Anderson says.

Adapted from "Criminal Justice, To Store or Restore," Baptist Today, Dec. 11, 2000.

6 Make it clear to the entire congregation that when one of them or one of their family members is charged with a crime, is in prison or is coming home from prison, or is a victim of a crime, that the congregation stands ready to support him or her.

Supporting the defendant or prisoner is not excusing his or her crime. It does not erase the consequences of the crime. Instead, your embrace acknowledges the reality of the fear, suffering, grief and humanity of the individual.

Supporting victims of a crime or the family of victims similarly acknowledges their fear, suffering, grief and humanity, but that embrace does not negate the humanity of the person who committed the crime.

A congregation's engagement in supporting its members who are affected by crime, arrest and incarceration may be triggered simply by learning of it. Often, just putting out the call is enough to start building momentum. Rev. Williams told the story of Mrs. Washington and Ron, put out the call to get involved, and the congregation responded.

Take a look around. Who will be the disciples in this work?

7 Carefully analyze talents, gifts and skills of your congregation. Match people's zeal with their capacity. Who has the respect and leadership skills? Who has a passion for the issue? Who can help coordinate the work? Who would be good at identifying community resources? Who would have the trust of the people being served?

8 Develop a training and accountability structure for your Station of Hope that will ensure that each disciple is prepared and supported in this ministry. Develop an informal support team to monitor, supervise and provide backup for the disciples. Develop a means for an immediate feedback loop to ensure continuous improvement and intervention and course -correction when needed. Use this manual and the resources identified here.

9 Take another look around. Who is in need of this ministry? Does anyone in this congregation have a family member or friend who is facing a criminal case, in jail or prison, or struggling with reintegration after being released? Is anyone suffering from being a victim of a crime?

Some say typically 70 percent of those attending services answer yes to this. That number is misleadingly low though, because shame keeps many from raising their hands.

Each of those friends and family members is calling for your support. Already, when one of our own gets sick we visit and nourish him or her. This ministry asks for the same mercy for those affected by crime (cf: Matthew 25:35-36).

10 Offer and provide your leadership to the disciples in this work.

As a leader in your community, you likely know other pastors, churches, faith-based organizations, community-based organizations seeking to address this crisis. If there are, you may have not only partners in this work, but could create a prayer circle of similarly concerned pastors who regularly meet and support one another's growth of this ministry.

Just as the process of redemption and reconciliation takes a community of believers to help with reintegration, the enormity of the challenges of reconciliation often requires pastors and institutions to come together to support one another in this healing work. This is why we propose the formation of "prayer circles," composed of prison ministries, men's ministries, prayer ministries and outreach ministries to support one another in this work.

During the Civil Rights Movement, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and his staff always sought to organize congregations to work together for change. It was their belief that if congregations came together for mutual support in light of the daunting odds before them, they stood a better chance in their move toward social change. Churches could work together, pray together (for this is a spiritual calling) and share resources as they approached their mission.

So, too, do we believe that the Civil Rights Movement of the 21st Century requires a coming together of pastors and congregations who are working to support their members affected by the criminal justice system.

The pastors and churches can learn from one another in their work. Pastors can pray for and support each other as they take on the awesome task of leadership in this ministry.

Being part of a cluster of churches -- a "prayer circle of churches"-- strengthens the witness of each congregation, provides a context for accountability between churches, and gives a greater visibility to the initiative in the larger community. One church can serve as a lead congregation - a Station of Hope - that can recruit other congregations in the work, that all might grow to be serious agents of reconciliation and redemption.

11 Do we have to set up a program or charter a nonprofit to do this work? Should we be seeking funding?

No, No, and No. The PNBC's hope is that in inventorying your strengths and assets, you will realize that such programs, structures and funding are not necessary. We are creating this manual partly because we realize that the government and foundations will never provide the funding to reach all the inmates, their families and victims of crime. The numbers are simply too overwhelming and the political will to make this a high priority is simply not there.

Securing funding is a time-consuming, wearying and often fruitless gamble; there are few dollars available and too many organizations competing for them. However, creating a Healing Community within your own church is no gamble at all. You can only win.

Of course, this does not preclude your partnering with existing programs to learn from them and to grow in your sophistication and awareness of the needs of prisoners, victims and their families.

You have the faith and the love. Therefore, you have the ready capacity to do this work.

Chapter Four

Creating a Healing Community: A Guide for Disciples

Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort; Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God. 2 Corinthians 1:2-4.

Facilitating Assistance
In Transition and Healing

The points of a disciple's (what others call "volunteers") potential engagement with individuals and families involved in the criminal justice system are many:

- Before a crime even occurs – PREVENTION
- When a crime occurs
- During the grieving process
- At the point of arrest
- During the time in jail awaiting the outcome of the case
- During incarceration
- While preparing for release
- Upon returning home from prison
- Reintegrating into the community
- Sustaining successful reintegration

The engagement of fellow members of your congregation will depend on where in this process its friends and family members are. If you are helping four or five people, each may be in a different stage in this process.

Disciple vs. Volunteer
We are choosing the word "disciple" here rather than "volunteer" because we view our work in the context of creating Healing Communities.

Familiarize yourself with the criminal justice process and the issues related to crime, incarceration and reentry and its impact on families and communities.

Read and discuss Chapter Two on "Why We Care" for important information about the issue of impact. However, the process itself is complex, as illustrated in the flowchart attached as Appendix C. Neither the typical victim of a crime, the defendant, nor their families is likely to initially understand the steps in the process. If you learn and understand the basics, you can help those to whom you are ministering understand and thus more easily navigate these waters.

Identify the resources that are available in your community to help defendants, prisoners, returning citizens, victims, and their families.

You can start by contacting your local "211" or United Way information and referral network and see if they have organized their resources for these targeted groups. Some of the resources you might want to identify include the core human services information, contact information for the jail, the courts and state corrections, the public defender's office, and bail bond companies. Housing, substance abuse treatment, job placement and referral services would also be helpful.

Start building partnerships and formal and informal networks of support for this work. Pastors and church leaders are being encouraged to develop prayer circles with a cluster partnering pastors, leaders and their churches for purposes of leading and guiding this work.

Disciples should also develop partnerships. Partnerships can strengthen and deepen your work. They can also help you answer questions, provide needed expertise, and increase the impact of your work. Partners you may want to consider including in your work could be:

- Other churches experienced or interested in this work
- Nonprofits providing one or more kinds of services to people facing incarceration, serving time or returning home
- Groups that provide mentoring services and train mentors
- Civil rights organizations working on criminal justice or prison issues
- Local and state corrections (jail and prison administrators)
- Local and state criminal justice or reentry task forces, councils or commissions
- State and local workforce agencies
- State and local housing agencies
- State and local health, mental health and substance abuse advocates and providers

Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine. For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; And they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables. 2 Timothy 4: 2-4 (KJV)

Preach the Good News. Be ready at all times, and tell people what they need to do. Tell them when they are wrong. Encourage them with great patience and careful teaching,³ because the time will come when people will not listen to the true teaching but will find many more teachers who please them by saying the things they want to hear. 2 Timothy 4: 2-4 (NCV)

PART ONE:

Guiding and helping the person arrested, incarcerated, or coming home

1 Pay attention and respond to the first contact. The content of your ministry will be shaped by who needs help and seeks it and who accepts it -- be it the defendant, victim, a family member, returning citizen or the community.

In many instances, regardless of whether the person is a defendant, family member or victim, the core of the care to be offered is similar – providing love and support is necessary regardless of how the person has been affected by the crime. However, there are important nuances because the forms of support will depend on the specific needs of the individuals. This part walks through those specific needs of the person accused or convicted of a crime.

2 Offer to help early – at the time of arrest. An arrest is devastating for the defendant and his family.

Starting the engagement with the prisoner upon his arrest is important because that is when fear and trembling is most stark and the need for support the greatest. The relationships formed at that point can be built upon and deepened as the person moves through the criminal justice process – to prison and (in most cases) the eventual return home.

While congregations and people of faith are increasing their engagement with people in prison and coming home from prison, few recognize the important role of helping at the beginning of the criminal justice process.

3 Find out about the correspondence, telephoning, and visiting rules. Jail and prison correspondence, telephone calls and visits are strictly regulated. The rules generally distinguish between approved visitors and community volunteers.

Visitors can't just show up at the door. The officials – federal, state or local, depending on who runs the facility – make up the rules and the rules must be followed. Rules for prison visits are available on the websites of the federal Bureau of Prisons (for federal prisons), most state departments of corrections (for state prisons) and many local jails. Chaplains also sometimes provide training or materials on these rules.

Breaking the rules (for instance, the visitor dress code) can result in denial of permission to visit.

CAUTION: Once on an individual's visitor list, you may

And the scribes and Pharisees brought unto him a woman taken in adultery; and when they had set her in the midst, They say unto him, Master, this woman was taken in adultery, in the very act. Now Moses in the law commanded us, that such should be stoned: but what sayest thou? This they said, tempting him, that they might have to accuse him. But Jesus stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground, as though he heard them not. So when they continued asking him, he lifted up himself, and said unto them, He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her. And again he stooped down, and wrote on the ground. And they which heard it, being convicted by their own conscience, went out one by one, beginning at the eldest, even unto the last: and Jesus was left alone, and the woman standing in the midst. When Jesus had lifted up himself, and saw none but the woman, he said unto her, Woman, where are those thine accusers? hath no man condemned thee? She said, No man, Lord. And Jesus said unto her, Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more.

John 8:4-11. (KJV)

be precluded from volunteering at that prison. FIND OUT THE RULES BEFORE MAKING YOUR FIRST VISIT.

4 Introduce yourself and work with the prison or jail chaplain. Sometimes the chaplain can be very helpful in navigating the prison system and its rules, can identify resources and can help you look out for the person you are caring for.

Also, the chaplain often is in charge of volunteer services; sometimes, these services are the bulk of or the only services provided to inmates because funding has been cut so deeply.

5 Write letters and offer to accept phone calls. The relationship can begin with letters, which are treasured by people in prison. Some receive none. One of the great advantages of letters is that they can be read again and again. In that respect, letters can have more lingering impact than a visit.

Don't get personal – don't scent the letter with perfume; don't try to build a personal relationship with the inmate. Romantic and sexual letters can result in visitation or program termination. Remember, once the letter reaches the correctional facility, it is read and becomes the property of corrections. Some prison ministries suggest that letters from inmates to those in the congregation corresponding with him be sent to the address of the church rather than to their homes.

Note to the reader:

This guide is organized in order of the person or persons to whom you are ministering, not in order of priority. Part One covers your work with defendants, prisoners and returning citizens. Part Two covers their families and Part Three covers victims of crime.

Letters to the prisoner must speak to the Word.

When a person is in jail or prison, often the only way they can telephone someone is to make a collect call. Some facilities are changing these rules to allow inmates to buy much less expensive calling cards, but many still require collect calling. The calls are the prisoner's lifeline (note: they are monitored). The call may be made just to hear a warm embracing voice, it may be to ask for help for a family member in crisis, and it may be because the prisoner is in fear for his own well-being and needs an advocate in seeking help. Accepting these calls is an act of fellowship.

CAUTION: Collect calls from correctional facilities may be very expensive – far more expensive than regular collect calls. It is important to put limits on the minutes and frequency of the calls.

Even if the person your congregation seeks to assist had no contact with the congregation for many years (or never has), it is still not too late to create a healing relationship with a person who has long been confined in prison.

6 Visit the person in jail or prison. If a correspondence develops, ask if you can be included on the visitor list of the person you want to visit. Be aware that prisoners are usually allowed a limited number of hours of visitation per month and that the prisoner's family, if they are visiting him, too, takes priority. Don't let your time interfere with theirs.

I was a stranger, and ye took me not in: naked, and ye clothed me not: sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not. Then shall they also answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee? Then shall he answer them, saying, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me. Matthew 25: 43-45 (KJV)

I was a stranger and you did not welcome Me and entertain Me, I was naked and you did not clothe Me, I was sick and in prison and you did not visit Me ¹with help and ministering care. Then they also [in their turn] will answer, Lord, when did we see You hungry or thirsty or a stranger or naked or sick or in prison, and did not minister to You? And He will reply to them, Solemnly I declare to you, in so far as you failed to do it for the least [in the estimation of men] of these, you failed to do it for Me. Matthew 25: 43-45 (AMP)

Thou therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. And the things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also. 2 Timothy 2: 1-2 (KJV)

Tell him he is loved. Show him compassion and mercy. And forgiveness.

Understand that once you arrive at a prison facility, you may have a long wait until you can begin the visit. Also, on occasion, the visit may be denied due to something happening inside the prison or with the prisoner that day.

Although a visit to a jail or prison will never reveal most of what goes on inside a prison, a visit can at least help the visitor glimpse the day-to-day life being led inside, enhancing the visitor's compassion for the prisoner.

7 Expect some tension during the first few visits. New relationships are always a bit tense. What will he think of me? What will I think of him? The prison environment enlarges these ordinary concerns.

For a chilling description of contemporary prison conditions, read the Final Report of the Commission on Safety and Abuse in America's Prisons online at <http://www.prisoncommission.org>

Preparing for the Prison Visit

Find a place of peace and calm through prayer before entering the facility.

You will guard him and keep him in perfect and constant peace whose mind [both its inclination and its character] is stayed on You, because he commits himself to You, leans on You, and hopes confidently in You. Isa.26:3 (AMP)

At the start, the person you are visiting needs your peace to calm both your own fears and his.

The first visit can often be very stressful for the prisoner and the visitor. If it's the visitor's first experience inside prison walls, the harsh clanging doors, the surveillance equipment, the security procedures and the hardened faces of both prisoners and staff can combine to create quite an intimidating experience.

Every visit has some kind of tension – especially first ones. Tension can also be high if the visitor did not have a relationship with the person prior to his incarceration. If you are visiting the son of a friend in your congregation, for example, such a visit is quite different from a visit from one of his parents or a sibling.

The fact that you are there is so positive, that the tension will likely abate. By showing up you have already broken through and opened the door to healing. Eventually, you will be called on to talk more deeply and to engage more fully.

8 Be present. And listen.

The person locked in a jail or prison needs to be heard. Really heard.

In most prisons, inmates are not always respected and their dignity is damaged. Rarely are they treated in a loving manner. Rarely are they referred to by name. Some prisons refer to the people confined there as “offenders,” sometimes by their numbers. Inmates’ concerns and fears are rarely expressed, both because they are likely to be rebuffed or ignored and because expressing them may seem to be a sign of weakness.

Your visit can counter this brutal darkness with light. It can serve to remind prisoners of their humanity. And you can provide what the prisoner has been deprived of: compassionate listening. Without prying, give him an opportunity to talk about his day-to-day life in the prison, his worries and his needs. It may be that you and your congregation can help to fill some of his unmet needs.

These visits can lead to a valuable mentoring relationship in which the visitor establishes a lasting, nurturing and guiding relationship with the incarcerated person.

Prisoners “are sneered at with venom.”

Pat Nolan, now the vice president of Prison Fellowship and the leader of its policy reform arm, Justice Fellowship, was the Republican leader of the California Assembly when he was convicted of bribery. A strong and confident man, he nonetheless felt brutalized by his experience in prison. “You’re an amputee, cut off from family, community, job, church, and, with your stump still bleeding, you’re tossed into this boiling cauldron of anger, hatred, bitterness, sexual repression, and you’re totally disrespected — screamed at – by officers all the time,” Pat says.

“You are sneered at with venom and told repeatedly, ‘You ain’t got nothing coming.’ The implication is that you are nothing, you’ve come from nothing and you will be nothing. You are worthless. You have no future. None.”

9 Offer to be present at the defendant's court appearances. The Civil Rights Movement has taught us that the significant presence or absence of supporters can affect the outcome of a case. This is the first step toward healing as well.

If an alternative to incarceration is an option (or if later in the process, a community-based sentence is an option), the church can create a place for such options to be realized.

10 Help the defendant in preparing for his legal defense or sentencing. Most people accused of crimes cannot afford an attorney. The law requires that the court appoint an attorney to represent the accused for free. In most cities, the public defender's office handles the bulk of such cases. But typically these lawyers are overworked and handle huge caseloads, which means that not a lot of work will go into the case.

Not every congregation has an experienced criminal defense attorney among its membership that can be tapped to help in a case of a member of the congregation. But the informal networks of the people in the congregation may well lead to the identification of such a person in the community that can help your congregation's accused get the help he or she needs.

The congregation can also help the lawyer (whether the public defender or a private lawyer) prepare the case. If the crime took place in the neighborhood of the congregation, the members may help identify witnesses or support frightened witnesses come forward to testify. It can also help line up character witnesses and letters of support addressed to the judge presiding over the sentencing.

11 Hold the prisoner accountable for what he has done.

Ron came to apologize to Mrs. Washington for the pain he had caused. To apologize first requires acknowledgment of the offense causing the pain.

But you are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a dedicated nation, [God's] own purchased, special people, that you may set forth the wonderful deeds and display the virtues and perfections of Him Who called you out of darkness into His marvelous light. 1 Peter 2:9. (AMP)

~ ~ ~ ~ ~

Confess to one another therefore your faults (your slips, your false steps, your offenses, your sins) and pray [also] for one another, that you may be healed and restored [to a spiritual tone of mind and heart]. The earnest (heartfelt, continued) prayer of a righteous man makes tremendous power available [dynamic in its working]. James 5: 16. (AMP)

~ ~ ~ ~ ~

"If a fellow believer hurts you, go and tell him—work it out between the two of you. If he listens, you've made a friend. If he won't listen, take one or two others along so that the presence of witnesses will keep things honest, and try again. If he still won't listen, tell the church. If he won't listen to the church, you'll have to start over from scratch, confront him with the need for repentance, and offer again God's forgiving love. Matthew 18:15-17 (Message).

Mrs. Washington needed Ron to hear about the suffering his act had caused her family – not in general terms, but in the terrible specifics. She needed Ron to know exactly what he had done so that he could hold himself accountable for it.

The film Dead Man Walking, based on the ministry of Sister Helen Prejean to death row inmates, provides a vivid glimpse of what is involved in visiting a prisoner and establishing a relationship with him. A number of study guides have been developed for viewers of this film. One helpful one can be found on this website:
<http://www.ocadp.org/films.htm>

However, many who are in jail or out on bond pending trial are reluctant to acknowledge responsibility, lest it interfere with their plea of not guilty. This may persist even after trial and all appeals have been exhausted.

Recall the many, many visits and prayers Sister Prejean offered Poncelet in the film Dead Man Walking before he could be redeemed by acknowledging his responsibility for the murder.

Redemption requires accountability; and for those who will be coming home from prison one day, accountability is the first step toward successful reintegration. To be accountable, one must acknowledge the wounded (the victim, family, and community). Restoration does not negate restitution.

That said, accountability cannot be forced. A relationship with a prisoner can be quickly shredded by a demand for confession or a demand for an apology. The visitor needs to stand strong in his mercy and forgiveness, make no demands, and let the person's acknowledgment arise in its own time.

In some cases, of course, the person is not guilty in fact. But it can be difficult to tell the difference. The feigned victim and the real victim may sound the same– they both may argue that they have been railroaded by the system, their lawyers were rotten, they are being scapegoated or they are the prey of a determined (or lazy) plot to pin blame for the crime on the wrong person.

But even the true victim of such a plot may be able one day to acknowledge that, even if it is not his fault, his situation is causing others to suffer.

I ask you to forgive your brothers the sins and the wrongs they committed in treating you so badly.
Genesis 50:17 (NIV)

And become useful and helpful and kind to one another, tenderhearted (compassionate, understanding, loving-hearted), forgiving one another [readily and freely], as God in Christ forgave you. Ephesians 4:32 (AMP)

12 Forgive him. And encourage his forgiveness of himself.

Forgiveness must precede healing. As the story of Mrs. Washington's forgiveness of Ron makes clear, forgiveness is less about the person forgiven than the freeing of the heart of the person offering forgiveness. One can only be untethered and unfettered from the harm and pain by releasing through forgiveness. Forgiveness is the essence of Christ. “Forgive them,” He said, “for they know not what they do.”

Forgiveness is a command by the Lord, and anything he commands us to do, we are able to do. If we are not willing to do it, the Holy Spirit will guide and allow forgiving beyond our fear and pain. Forgiveness, as Mrs. Washington saw, will happen when our pain outweighs our fear. (Shout here!) “Perfect love casts out fear.”

You cannot move forward by looking in the rearview mirror.

13 Identify supportive resources (e.g., education, training, treatment) in the prison and in the communities neighboring the prison.

Throughout the country, states have scaled back funding of prison programs – educational, vocational, and treatment. Into this vacuum have come volunteer programs, each of which has to be approved by the prison where they are conducted. Because there is often a rather informal structure to such programs, they are rarely mandated and, often as not, not known to all the prisoners who are eligible to take advantage of them.

A congregation could do some research and sleuthing to identify the formal programs, the volunteer programs, and possibilities of new programs being developed by communities neighboring the prison. Such an inventory might suggest that their friend in prison could benefit from the program and might need an advocate with prison officials to get him in it.

The congregation might also find correspondence courses that would be interesting to and relevant to their friend’s goals, and then help him find the support necessary to enroll in such courses.

14 Help in preparing for release from prison.

Although departments of corrections lately are increasingly recognizing that part of their job is to help inmates prepare for release and successful reintegration, most do not actually do very much toward that goal. Indeed, some people are actually “frog-walked” in shackles from segregation to the prison gate; imagine how prepared such a person is for reintegration.

Most people are released from prison with a small amount of money (often in the form of a check despite the fact that they do not have the I.D. necessary to cash it) and a bus ticket home. In some instances, the release happens suddenly (the paperwork is finally completed) and sometimes in the middle of the night.

The person is dropped off at a bus station teeming with people ready to tempt or re-engage the person in a criminal lifestyle. Women released from prison in this way are particularly vulnerable. Women are the least likely to be met at the gate by friends or family members and when they get off the bus, they are readily identified by the pathetic paper bag of personal possessions they were allowed to take out of prison. Pimps and drug dealers virtually lunge at these women at the station. Having nowhere to go and no one to turn to, they may well accept these invitations to return to crime if someone is not there to offer an alternative.

15 Help in the preparation of a release / discharge plan (a transition accountability plan).

Often inmates spend years with no rehabilitative services, virtually vegetating. When nothing has been done to prepare a person for release, his or her likelihood of success upon release is not great.

Even if the prison staff help inmates prepare a discharge plan, it may have a lot of blanks that need to be filled in. Members of the congregation who have befriended the inmate can help fill in those blanks

The team of members from the congregation supporting the person in prison can start by figuring out who is doing what in the community that can help people coming out of prison. Is there a comprehensive prisoner reentry program? Is there a program that helps people with criminal records get jobs? Are there drug treatment programs that could help him? If he has mental health problems, what programs or agencies are involved in this work? Who provides housing for people coming home from prison?

Filling in the blanks for one person's plan can be a start in creating a resource directory that people in the congregation could use to help others as well.

16 Help establish realistic expectations.

Before filling in the details of the discharge plan, it is important to counsel the prisoner about what it is reasonable and not reasonable to expect upon release. The family may or may not welcome him with open arms. Getting and keeping a job can be very challenging.

The Reentry National Media Outreach Campaign distributes the documentary Road to Return and an accompanying discussion guide.

The award-winning film, narrated by Tim Robbins, profiles both people who have committed crimes and crime victims, and addresses the complex, unique needs of prisoners returning to society and trying desperately, often heroically, to go straight. It provides a sobering – and at the same time uplifting – view of life as seen through the eyes of a number of men and women who have become caught in the vicious circle of poverty, crime, incarceration, release, return to crime, and return to prison.

It is critical to keep in mind that you promise only what you are certain you can deliver.

Just making the transition from a world where decisions are made for you to one in which decisions must be made by you is often one of the toughest challenges. People speak of some prisoners becoming “institutionalized.” They become so much a part of the world of the prison that it becomes the only place understandable as “home” to the inmate.

One of the classic portrayals of institutionalization is seen in the movie Shawshank Redemption. Brooks, an elderly man who has served as the prison librarian for many of his 50 years in prison, is granted parole. Told he could leave, he threatens to slit the throat of another inmate so he will be forced to stay in prison. His friends intervene, and no one is harmed. His friends try to understand why Brooks would do such a thing. Red, another inmate who has been there for a long, long time explains, “These walls are funny. First, you hate them, then you get used to them. Enough time passes . . . you get so you depend on them. That’s institutionalized.”

Brooks is released. Even with the parole board’s help in finding him a halfway house and a job, he cannot function in the world. He simply does not know how. He misses his “home” and commits suicide.

Older inmates, in particular, have enormous challenges. They have never used a touch-tone phone, never seen a cell phone, never touched the keys of a computer, never used a self-flushing toilet. The world has changed beyond recognition. Something as ordinary as traffic can feel frightening.

Another form of institutionalization sees the prisoner start to lose basic but essential skills such as decision-making.

Pat Nolan, who was imprisoned for only 29 months (“only” compared to the fictional Brooks’ 50 years!) says that when he was released, he couldn’t even pick out what to eat from a restaurant menu. This man, who as a legislative leader had made hundreds of split-second decisions on the floor of the California Assembly, came out of prison unable to navigate a menu. Flustered by being unable to decide, he ordered a turkey sandwich. He didn’t even want turkey.

The Reentry National Media Outreach Campaign also distributes the documentary Omar and Pete with an accompanying discussion guide. This film is an unflinching view of the journey of reentry and reintegration of two African American men with similar long histories of being in and out of prison and struggling with drug addiction. It explores both the issue of personal responsibility and society’s responsibility for their tragic lives, as well as the web of social and economic barriers that low-income African-American men face in the context of incarceration and release. It also examines existing support structures, and those that are needed, to help former prisoners successfully reenter their families and neighborhoods.

The film and its epilogue do an excellent job of illuminating how developing realistic expectations can make the difference between success and failure upon reentry.

Given the depletion of such natural human gifts and assets by prisons, imagine how hard it would be to make the much harder decisions demanded on the job, or to handle even petty conflicts that arise in the course of the day.

17 Help prepare for community supervision (e.g., parole). In some states, nearly everyone who leaves prison is under some form of community supervision or parole; in other states, very few are.

While some states are thinking of ways to improve their supervision policies and practices so that they are more favorable to reintegration, many parole officers still operate as though they are part of a police force – looking for violations of the rules and a chance to send people back to prison, rather than ways to help with successful reintegration.

Given this reality, it is helpful to counsel on the importance of abiding by the rules.

The disciple would do well to get a copy of the technical parole rules so as to guide the returning citizen on these matters. Violating a minor rule can result in being returned to prison.

In some states, for instance, Texas, parole offices are being established in churches. The rate of compliance with the requirements of meeting with parole officers, as a result, increased substantially.

18 Address the issue of residency prior to release. In many states, release cannot occur unless the officials can verify that the person has a place to live. The earlier the process of finding a residence begins, the less likely delay in release will happen.

Sometimes people are required to start their return home by staying in a halfway house, but that is becoming increasingly rare. Most people leaving prison have to figure out where they will be staying.

Some inmates expect that they will go home and live with a family member or perhaps a girlfriend. Keep in mind that this is not always the expectation, or even the desire, of the other party.

Jennifer

Gonnerman's book, Life on the Outside: The Prison Odyssey of Elaine Bartlett, is the first major work of journalism on the subject of reentry: the challenge of leaving prison and reentering the free world. It tells the story of Elaine Bartlett, who spent 16 years behind bars for selling cocaine — a first offense — under New York's controversial Rockefeller drug laws. The book opens on the morning of January 26, 2000, when she walks out of Bedford Hills prison. At 42, Elaine has virtually nothing: no money, no job, no real home.

If this is the prisoner's expectation, you can counsel him to write to the party with whom he plans to stay and find out if he really would be welcome. If not, you and others in the congregation can help him by finding suitable, affordable housing.

Sometimes prisons give people about to leave prison a list of shelters. The list, though, may be outdated, and even if it is not, how is the person leaving prison to find out which one has an available bed? He can't go from shelter to shelter. He's not going to have a phone and likely he will have no change for a pay phone (if he can find one; with the increasing use of cell phones, phone booths are becoming nearly extinct). Each of the shelters may be full the night he comes home.

Help the person coming home by "reserving," if you can, a room. Some communities have transitional housing specifically for people coming out of prison. Find out if your community does and what additional housing resources might be there.

19 Address the issue of post-release employment.

You may have found some great job placement programs while helping the individual develop a discharge plan, but even better than that is finding someone actually willing to offer him a job. Even if not, once the person finds a job, you can help him succeed and his employer feel more comfortable by offering to coach him and intervene if problems arise.

The Public / Private Ventures website has a host of free publications including manuals that can help a congregation better understand coaching and mentoring.

This is another area in which helping to establish realistic expectations is important. Many, many jobs are off-limits to people with criminal records. In Florida, for instance, a governor's task force found that over 40 percent of the public and private jobs in the state had restrictions based on criminal history. Also, even

The LORD is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the LORD for ever. Psalm 23 (KJV)

THE LORD is my Shepherd [to feed, guide, and shield me], I shall not lack. He makes me lie down in [fresh, tender] green pastures; He leads me beside the still and restful waters. He refreshes and restores my life (my self); He leads me in the paths of righteousness [uprightness and right standing with Him--not for my earning it, but] for His name's sake. Yes, though I walk through the [deep, sunless] valley of the shadow of death, I will fear or dread no evil, for You are with me; Your rod [to protect] and Your staff [to guide], they comfort me. You prepare a table before me in the presence of my enemies. You anoint my head with oil; my [brimming] cup runs over. Surely or only goodness, mercy, and unfailing love shall follow me all the days of my life, and through the length of my days the house of the Lord [and His presence] shall be my dwelling place. Psalm 23 (Amplified) when a job is not formally restricted, employers can and do create their own restrictions.

Still, some employers are standing up and letting it be known that they will give people with records a “second chance” and offer them jobs. Your church could help identify such employers and encourage others to follow this same path. Within a given community, churches can come together and support one another’s efforts to expand the pool of available jobs to people with records.

20 Identify who will join a circle of peer support.

Think of peer support as a Shepherd. The circle should be composed of reliable and supportive people who have a compassionate understanding of their role and also the ability to respect boundaries.

People coming home from prison need support. They might seek that support from the same folks who helped land them in prison—unless others are there to provide it. Those who don’t have solid and positive support may turn to other people and things (such as drugs) that fill the void. The circle of peer support that you create will prevent such turns.

A circle of peer support, properly conceived, can help the returning citizen make good choices and avoid bad ones. It can provide guidance, a feeling of welcome and a sense of purpose.

The group should not be so large as to be intimidating; nor should it seem as though the individual’s past is being too broadly shared. If relationships have been building between members of the congregation and the person about to be released, the members are the naturals for coaching and support upon release and for helping to build a circle of peer support.

If relationships have not been built thus far, ask who can fill such roles. One person might help in coaching about financial planning, another about staying clean from drugs and another might help with family problems. The roles will be defined by what he needs.

21 Identify people who can respond 24/7 to crises.

In addition to peer support, it is helpful to have one or more people ready to respond if serious problems arise. It may be that two or three people are called to this role – assuring that someone will be there if a crisis erupts.

22 Work with prison officials to be clear on date and time of discharge so you can meet the individual at the gate (or bus station) and take him home.

Paperwork problems can cause delays. The illness of the prisoner can cause delays. And a sudden reversal on appeal or commutation can accelerate the release date.

Even when a release date seems certain, things may arise that can accelerate or delay the release. To be sure that you can meet the person at the gate, it is helpful to let the prison officials, including the chaplain, know of your intentions so you can be notified of any changes in plans.

23 Welcome the individual back into the community and church. One of the most meaningful and welcoming gestures a congregation can make is for the pastor and senior church leaders to stand before the congregation and acknowledge the former prisoner's welcome into the church.

Big surprise celebrations, on the other hand, can be great fun or can cause great anxiety. If you plan a welcoming celebration, consult first with the prisoner. Ask whom he is comfortable having present and whom he would rather not see right away.

Keep the celebration as low-key as possible. If the person has had drug or alcohol problems, a party might be a venue for a relapse. Keep it clean and sober. Remember, the individual has just come from a tightly controlled environment. A party with lots of nieces and nephews jumping up and down and on the furniture may be too much too soon. Also, keep the celebration short. Let your friend move away from the people participating when he feels that is what he must do.

"When he came to his senses, he said, 'How many of my father's hired men have food to spare, and here I am starving to death! I will set out and go back to my father and say to him: Father, I have sinned against heaven and against you. I am no longer worthy to be called your son; make me like one of your hired men.' So he got up and went to his father. But while he was still a long way off, his father saw him and was filled with compassion for him; he ran to his son, threw his arms around him and kissed him.

"The son said to him, 'Father, I have sinned against heaven and against you. I am no longer worthy to be called your son.'

"But the father said to his servants, 'Quick! Bring the best robe and put it on him. Put a ring on his finger and sandals on his feet. Bring the fattened calf and kill it. Let's have a feast and celebrate. For this son of mine was dead and is alive again; he was lost and is found.' So they began to celebrate. Luke 15: 17-24 (NIV)

24 Provide close support, especially for the first 72 hours after release. The transition from prison to home is going to be stressful and the longer the prison sentence, the more stressful the return will be.

Be there for him or her and his or her family. Offer to drive him where he needs to go, for instance to the initial visit (if any is required) with the parole officer (and accompany him if that is allowed); go with him to the department of motor vehicles to get a state identify card; help him learn to drive again and take him to get his driver's license; help him get his other identity papers, such as his birth certificate and Social Security card.

Help arrange visits with family members with whom he is not living – to the extent each is ready for such a visit.

Counsel and support him as temptations and challenges arise.

25 Continue the work of reconciliation and help develop a restitution plan. As he settles in, help him think about how he can contribute to the healing of his family, the victim and his family, the church and the community. Develop a plan with him outlining ways that he can “give back.”

26 Help people in the congregation with recent as well as long-past criminal records. This manual has focused on the needs arising in the context of arrest, imprisonment, and return home. And while there are hundreds of thousands struggling with those problems, there are millions of additional people with old criminal records, still suffering both from the stigma and the myriad consequences that attach upon a conviction.

These consequences affect the ability of the 71 million people in the U.S. (over 30percent of the adult population) whose names are in criminal history databases, to reintegrate and realize all the opportunities and benefits the rest of society can enjoy.

They include the ability to secure gainful employment or a professional license (in Florida, where such restrictions were inventoried, over 40 percent of the jobs in the Florida economy were subject to employment restrictions based on criminal records), to vote, to hold office, to serve on a jury, and get various kinds of public benefits and housing.

A person’s criminal record can haunt him in any or all of these venues for life. But apart from restrictive laws and rules, many employers and other entities create their own restrictions; it is here that a congregation can be helpful. Individuals can vouch for the person with the record and provide a recommendation as to his character.

If the person is seeking a pardon or to expunge the record, members can also speak or write on his behalf.

In a larger sense, the congregation can advocate for fairer and carefully tailored restrictions.

PART TWO

Guiding and helping the families of defendants, prisoners, and returning citizens

1 Help the family of the defendant or prisoner. Embrace each of them. Tell them it’s not their fault. They are loved. They remain welcome in the arms of the congregation.

After an arrest, the family of the person arrested is simply heartbroken. Family members suffer great shame and embarrassment, sorrow and grief for both the victim of the crime and for their kin facing criminal charges; they also fear rejection and have feelings of responsibility and unworthiness. At such a time, they desperately need the love and support of their church. In most instances, they will not seek it out. The congregation needs to seek them out.

Let them know they are not blamed, but loved, and that support is available.

Sometimes, the families of the victim and of the accused are members of the same church. Make it clear that both are welcome and preach forgiveness till it hurts.

2 Address the families' material needs. Often it is the family's breadwinner who is sitting in jail and no longer able to support the family. The congregation may want to help ensure that the family's basic material needs are met and help them find a means of continuing to meet those needs in the absence of the breadwinner.

At first, if the family has emergency needs, they perhaps can be met through the congregation's emergency support funds -- later by their helping the family navigate the government and charitable support systems. Throughout the process, what is most needed is building and sustaining the relationship with the family. The family of the victim may also be in material need. Due to the crime, the breadwinner may no longer be present or, if present, may not be able to work.

The emotional fallout from the crime may have immobilized the family to the point of neglecting their basic needs. Look out for them. Look for signs of falling back or rising up. Offer a helping hand. You might want to form a support group to help these families. What existing groups within the church can naturally provide support (for instance, Nurses, Deaconesses, Missionaries, Hospitality, Benevolence, Food Pantry)?

The prisoner, too, may have basic needs that are not being met -- for instance, soap or deodorant. In most facilities, visitors may neither bring such items nor mail them to the inmate. Such

He comforts us in all our troubles so that we can comfort others. When they are troubled, we will be able to give them the same comfort God has given us. For the more we suffer for Christ, the more God will shower us with his comfort through Christ. Even when we are weighed down with troubles, it is for your comfort and salvation! For when we ourselves are comforted, we will certainly comfort you. Then you can patiently endure the same things we suffer. We are confident that as you share in our sufferings,

*Comfort, oh comfort my people says your God.
"Speak softly and tenderly to Jerusalem, but also make it very clear that she has served her sentence, that her sin is taken care of—forgiven! She's been punished enough and more than enough, and now it's over and done with."
Isaiah 40:1-2. [Message]*

facilities instead require a certified check or money order for deposit in the inmate's account. He can then buy what he needs from the facility's commissary.

3 Build a mentoring relationship with the family.

Ideally, mentoring is done by a team of members from the congregation. Mentoring teams can support families with love and understanding and help reconcile them and their community. In practical and material ways, they can help families assess their own strengths and needs and help them meet their needs by identifying the services and resources available to them.

Mentoring families of prisoners also benefits the members of the congregation as new kinds of intimacy and trust are nourished – between the family and the team and among the team members and congregation. Faith can be deepened through support of the families.

And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse. Malachi 4:6 (KJV)

He will lead children and parents to love each other more, so that when I come, I won't bring doom to the land. Malachi 4:6 (CEV)

4 Provide mentoring support to the children of the person in jail or prison.

A particular interest in mentoring the children of incarcerated parents is growing nationwide. Children whose parents are in prison suffer many grievous challenges, and a congregation's support and mentoring of such children can help them surmount them.

However, mentoring of children whose parents are in prison is not, in some cases, without a measure of controversy. Some have criticized those mentoring such children as undermining the parental relationships – and even seeking to replace them. Some mentors have been said to have spoken cruelly of the parents (the one incarcerated and sometimes also the one caring for the child) to the children, causing the children additional grief and distance from the parents.

A pastor told us that as a young man, he worked with people in jail and bought a pair of sneakers for an inmate he had grown attached to. Later, the inmate's mother approached and gently explained that it was her job to provide for her son and that she had been made to look bad in his eyes by having someone else buy the sneakers. She suggested that next time she be consulted and that he might even want to buy a gift and allow her to give it to her son.

Train up a child in the way he should go: and when he is old, he will not depart from it. Proverbs 22:6.

So take me for your example, even as I take Christ for mine. 1 Corinthians 11:1. (BE)

With these important caveats, supporting the children of a parent who is in prison can help heal the relationship between the children and their parents and heal their other tattered relationships as well. One of the very positive approaches to such support is Amachi (an Ibo word meaning “who knows but what God has brought us through this child”) Headquartered in Philadelphia, Amachi works in partnership with the Big Brother and Big Sister programs; their approach can be a model for your congregation. Amachi partners disciples from local congregations with children of the incarcerated.

A number of programs and resources that are aimed at helping children whose parents are incarcerated. They include Amachi, the Center for Children of Incarcerated Parents, and the Family and Corrections Network. Their websites are listed in the appendix.

5 Help the family build or sustain a relationship with the prisoner. Whether support of the affected families began at arrest or not, throughout the period of incarceration such support is critical to their well-being and the well-being of the principals – the prisoner and his victim.

Social, psychological, material, and spiritual support may each be needed, albeit in different measures, depending on the parties.

It is important to remember that not all family members of a prisoner stand ready to embrace him. Some are angry with him or her for having brought shame to their family; some are angry because of the disruption that the arrest and imprisonment has caused; and still others are angry because they are the direct victim(s) of the crime. Err on the side of respecting family members’ feelings about reunification or reconciliation – especially at the outset of the relationships with the family members.

Incarceration is a family affair:

The family, living on the outside, may well be living in a prison as confining and terrible as their loved one behind bars. For more information and helpful resources to help families of prisoners, go to the Family and Corrections Network at: <http://www.fcnetwork.org/>

When the anger is still ripe, be patient. Recall that Mrs. Washington retained her anger for 14 years before she heard her daughter say, “That’s enough, momma, that’s enough. Forgive him.”

One of our friends recalls the words of a close relative of a prisoner: “How dare you,” she said to the person trying to bring her and her family member in prison together, “how dare you open up this chapter in my life that I have been trying to close?”

At some point, you may help to resolve such conflicts, but just as you should not press the prisoner to acknowledge his wrongdoing, you cannot press family members into relationships for which they are not ready.

6 Assist with transportation when needed, which might include an offer to drive the family to see the prisoner.

America's prisons are usually sited in remote rural locations. This is because the land is cheap and because prisons have served as states' economic development plums for small towns – and for favored politicians who bring the prisons to their towns. That leaves the community and family members of the person in prison terribly far away.

Sometimes, there is no public transportation to the prison.

A road trip to a prison can provide an opportunity for the member of the congregation driving the family to deepen his or her relationship with the family members, learn more about their needs and concerns, and lead to doing a better job of supporting the family.

Nearly everyone who takes the time and spends the money for the gas or bus necessary for prison visits says it is well worth it. The joy is very much two-sided. The visitor is lifted up by the appreciation for the visit and the prisoner is lifted up by the love and contact with the outside world.

Remember: If the disciple is traveling to the prison and wants to visit the prisoner with the family, the disciple will need to be cleared to enter the prison (see the section above on learning about visitation rules).

7 Help the children of the parent who is incarcerated stay in touch with him or her. Another critical role a congregation can fill is to help the children of the person in prison keep in contact with him or her and help the children build and maintain a loving relationship with their incarcerated parent. In addition to taking them to visit or taking them to places where videoconferencing with imprisoned parents is made available, members of the congregation can encourage and help the children write letters and draw pictures for their parents.

Note: Children, too, have to be cleared for prison visits and video-conferencing. Also, sometimes the nature of the criminal offense will preclude the prisoner from any contact with children.

Because of the great growth of such ministries, we are not detailing all of what is involved in helping the children of prisoners in this manual; instead, Appendix B lists a number of valuable resources for this work.

Thou therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. And the things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also. 2 Timothy 2: 1-2 (KJV)

8 Involve the family in preparing for the return home. The family may or may not understand what to expect upon the release of their loved one. During the time in prison, their bonds may have strengthened or they may have frayed. The person coming home may have apologized for the strain his imprisonment has caused his family, or he may not have.

The family needs support and assurance that the support will continue for them and their loved one upon his or her release.

On a more practical level, the family can help, prior to release, line up the essentials that the person will be needing. These include helping him or her line up housing and treatment. A checklist of the essentials can be found in Appendix J.

PART THREE

Guiding and helping the victim and the family of the victim

The love and support of the victim and his or her family can help the congregation working with the defendant or prisoner understand the full consequences of the crime. This knowledge will help develop the accountability necessary for reconciliation with the individual and perhaps, ultimately, a form of forgiveness extended to him.

This Family Freedom Kit is not intended to supply congregations all they need to know about working with victims of crime. A vast amount of resources have been developed for this purpose. Look in the section on crime victims in Appendix B's "Useful Resources."

We were moved to address the victim in this manual in part because of the enormous role that Mrs. Washington played in Ron's and her church's healing.

Arna Washington decided to forgive Ron 14 years after the murder. First she saw a very nervous Ron, clutching his Bible as he approached her. The frightened young man sat with the parent of his crime victim. She did not show up to meet him to forgive him, but simply to find out what happened the night he killed her daughter and perhaps get some closure. The surprise, enormity, and miracle of forgiveness she offered brought everyone to tears.

Sycamore Tree, which helped Ron Flowers and led to his seeking out Mrs. Washington, and Bridges to Life, which grew out of that model, are but two of many fine programs that address the needs of victims. For more programs that help victims of crime, see Appendix B.

The federal Office of Victims of Crime has many additional resources, including publications and a database of local resources, such as support groups. <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/ovc/>

But her forgiveness did more. It lifted her from grief and anger to joy and life again. It lifted the anger and fury of the congregation. It healed them.

That said, forgiveness cannot be forced. It must develop in its own time. The victim and his or her family need the congregation's love and support whether or not they ever forgive the perpetrator of the crime.

Not all crimes have a direct victim – not in the sense of an actual person. Some crimes are crimes against the community. Communities can be brought to forgiveness, too.

Begin the process of reconciliation.

Reconciliation involves more than the person who committed the crime and the victims; the process of reconciliation belongs to the community, as well. And it takes time – time, faith and determination to overcome a world of hurt.

But all things are from God, Who through Jesus Christ reconciled us to Himself [received us into favor, brought us into harmony with Himself] and gave to us the ministry of reconciliation [that by word and deed we might aim to bring others into harmony with Him]. 2 Corinthians 5:18. (AMP)

“Reconciliation” refers to the actual reconfiguring of relationships as wrought by the redemptive process. Those who have been incarcerated have committed acts that inflicted harm on their communities, friends, and loved ones, whether intentionally or not. Violent and property offenses bring pain to neighbors. Domestic violence brings clear harm to loved ones. Incarceration causes a separation that can and does strain, fracture, and even end relationships within family and friendship networks.

Reconciliation and redemptive processes involve a making right of relationships among all parties concerned -- offender, victim, family, and the larger community. All are stakeholders in the restoration of meaningful relationships that sustain not only the person formerly incarcerated, but also those who have been victimized, either directly or indirectly, by the ex-offender.

As Prison Fellowship International, which has developed reconciliation programs, has written, reconciliation often “begins when the [individual who has committed the crime] confesses and repents (as in the case of Onesimus), but it may begin with the victim’s offer of forgiveness. However, for reconciliation to be complete, both parties will need to do their parts. . . . Justice repairs the harm caused by injustice. Reconciliation, which can come only after the material, emotional, and relational harms have been addressed, is a sign that things have been made right.”

Chapter Five

Expanding the circle of healing to the community through advocacy

And the LORD said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? And he said, I know not: Am I my brother's keeper? Genesis 4:9 (KJV)

For centuries, churches have been at the forefront of social change. In the United States, the black church was the foundation of the Civil Rights Movement. Today, it continues to be engaged in policy advocacy. In January 2008, two back-to-back historic meetings of Baptist conventions in Atlanta underscored the Baptist commitment to advocacy. The first

Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the LORD is risen upon thee. For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people: but the LORD shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee. Isaiah 60:1-2 (KJV) meeting was the second time the African-American Baptist conventions came together; for the second meeting, they were joined by more than a score of additional Baptist organizations to celebrate A New Baptist Covenant.

These meetings tackled many of the issues that Baptists today are addressing, including health disparities, breaking cycles of poverty, global warming, the struggles of children and youth, and criminal justice.

For decades, politicians have hammered the public with “get tough” criminal justice policies even as poor minority communities have seen ever-increasing numbers of their youth pulled into the cradle-to-prison pipeline under those policies. African-Americans recognized this problem but for years they stood nearly alone in decrying it.

That has now changed. The Civil Rights Movement of the 21st century – the movement calling for reforming criminal justice policies – now counts not only other Baptists among its members, but people across political, ideological and theological spectrums. Together they are rising up and saying “NO” to mass incarceration, “NO” to prisons that fail to rehabilitate, and “NO” to policies creating barriers to success upon coming home.

The National Reentry Media Outreach Campaign documentary God and the Inner City provides examples of how churches can work with local law enforcement, social workers, and welfare officials to save youth and others from jail, drug dependence, and unemployment.

A crime is rarely an event isolated from its social context; it is part of a larger set of problems facing the church and the community. As members of the church and the community, we have a duty and responsibility to walk our brothers and sisters through the criminal justice processes responding to the crime.

Crime creates victims beyond the individual people injured. Crime can create feelings of unease, fear, frustration and anger. The church can reach out and help to heal the community's wounds.

The criminal justice system focuses on the perpetrator; it arrests him, tries him, and imprisons him. But the church has a wider lens. The church puts its attention on the community; it strives for reconciliation, which always involves more than the person who committed the crime. It involves the victims and it belongs to the community.

Mrs. Washington's pastor told us, "Forgiveness makes you a witness." After Mrs. Washington forgave Ron, the entire congregation witnessed the reality of forgiveness. The people of the church then brought the message to the larger community. That witness is the essence of advocacy.

In a broader fashion, reconciliation addresses root causes of the injury and suggests practical and policy solutions. Faith communities move toward reconciliation in a variety of ways -- by supporting families and by extending the reach of their ministry to the larger social justice concerns reflected by the crime.

The sea change in public opinion about crime and punishment

In the eighties and nineties, the public told pollsters that crime and drugs were among their top concerns. As a consequence, lawmakers enacted "tough-on-crime measures" such as "three strikes," "truth in sentencing," parole abolition, and mandatory minimum sentences. Now as the years have passed, the public's disposition has shifted. Such measures don't have the appeal they once did.

Today, at the national level, candidates for office barely mention crime -- but do mention the plight of prisoners being released to communities where jobs and support systems are lacking. And they do mention the explosive growth of America's prisons.

Polls on crime and punishment are now showing that the public's attitude has shifted.

- 82 percent of voters say that those coming out of prison are as likely or more likely to commit future crimes than if they had never been imprisoned.

- 91 percent think the prison experience itself reinforces criminal behavior.
- 87 percent want rehabilitation services provided in prisons and/or upon release.
- Only 11 percent now favor the dated punishment-only model.

Policy Shifts in Washington

Second Chance Act. With these shifts in opinion, we see policy changes at the local, state and federal levels, too. After President Bush said in a State of the Union address, “America is the land of second chance, “and when the gates of the prison open, the path ahead should lead to a better life,” prisoner reentry legislation that had been languishing in Congress got a second chance and substantial bipartisan support. The latest iteration of the bill, the Second Chance Act, is likely to pass in 2008 and the President has signaled that he will sign it.

The Act appropriates funds for Justice Department grants to do primarily two things:

- Develop and implement strategic reentry plans at the state and local levels.
- Expand services and support for people in prison and in the communities to which they return home.

The bill is advancing in both chambers due in part to its broad support – across party, ideological and regional lines. Its diverse sponsors include Sam Brownback (R-KS) and Barack Obama (D-IL) in the Senate; and in the House, conservative Republicans such as Chris Cannon (R-UT) and Howard Coble (R-NC) and liberal Democrats including lead sponsor Danny Davis (D-IL) and Dennis Kucinich (D-OH).

The proposed funds are by no means substantial -- $191 million, a fraction of the more than $41 billion that states spent in 2004 on their prisons. Still, the funds will support efforts that might significantly transform policies and practices across the states to move corrections beyond their narrow mission of confinement to include the mission of successful return to communities.

Disparate sentencing: Crack vs. powder cocaine. Under a federal law passed in 1986 and associated sentencing

As a symbolic political gesture, the Second Chance Act completely reverses recent practice. For the first time in decades, Congress is poised to pass a bill that aims to make the lives of prisoners and ex-prisoners easier, not more difficult.

“The Right Has a Jailhouse Conversion,” New York Times Magazine, December 24, 2006.

When I shut up heaven and there is no rain, or command the locusts to devour the land, or send pestilence among My people, if My people who are called by My name will humble themselves, and pray and seek My face, and turn from their wicked ways, then I will hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin and heal their land. 2 Chronicles: 13-14 (KJV) guidelines, a person convicted of dealing in crack cocaine was, until recently, subject to the same sentence as one dealing in 100 times as much powder cocaine. Since that time, data have proved that the assumptions underlying this law were false. Crack is not more addictive, more likely to provoke violence, or more dangerous than powder cocaine.

In May 2007, the U.S. Sentencing Commission proposed modifying the guidelines to allow lesser sentences for crack convictions and in December 2007, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that federal judges may deviate from these guidelines. The following day, the Sentencing Commission's new guidelines took effect, making 19,500 inmates sentenced under previous guidelines-- about 80 percent of whom were African American -- eligible for sentence reductions. But the disparities in the underlying law remain in place. Five bipartisan bills are pending in Congress to change the 100-to-1 disparity in the federal law.

Some criminal justice issues that states and local governments, often with the leadership and support of faith communities, are addressing:

Stemming prison growth. States are grappling with prison overcrowding and the soaring costs of the still-growing prison population. Some states, notably Kansas, Texas, and Connecticut, with the help of the Council of State Government's Justice Reinvestment Initiative, are rejecting further prison construction, pursuing sentencing and parole reforms instead.

2 Reversing the incentives that allow ratcheting up of charges, sentences, and classification upon confinement. In most states, prosecution, courts, and jails are locally funded. Each of these entities competes for scarce local funds. Prisons, by contrast, are state-funded. When officials charge an individual with a felony rather than a misdemeanor, or sentence an individual to a year-and-a-day (or shorter state term under a felony conviction), the defendant goes to a state-funded prison rather than the local jail. This process leaves more funds available for local functions. Some states are realizing that this is bad public policy and, at least in the juvenile justice arena, are shifting the incentives to reward localities that employ alternatives to state incarceration. Some are considering similar reforms of the adult system.

3 Addressing conditions of confinement. The bipartisan Commission on Safety and Abuse in America's Prisons issued a report in 2006 headlined, "What happens in prisons does not stay in prisons." The report highlights the importance of just and humane conditions in reducing recidivism.

4 Undoing over-classification of inmates. In Massachusetts, a study commission found that officials who decide whether to assign a person to a minimum-, medium- or maximum-security facility had an incentive to give inmates high classification levels. The incentive? The unionized officers knew that the higher the classification, the more officers per inmate are required – thus growing the union. Shifting this function to management, the commission concluded, would reduce costs and improve the conditions of confinement of over-classified inmates.

5 Securing treatment for mentally ill people who are arrested. States and local governments are also addressing the incarceration, sometimes under cruel conditions, of the mentally ill and developmentally disabled. Jurisdictions across the country are setting up mental health courts and seeking alternatives to incarceration. Public-interest lawyers are increasingly suing state and local governments to end the suffering and ill treatment of mentally ill people in prisons and jails, particularly the use of pepper gas and four-point restraints either to punish infractions or to assert control.

6 Stopping gun violence. Starting in Chicago, and then spreading to other Illinois communities, gun violence is being addressed by CeaseFire as the public health epidemic that it is. When violence erupts, culturally competent teams are deployed to intervene and prevent the spread of retaliatory violence. Across the country, communities are working to get guns off the streets through buy-back programs, gun bans and the development of healthy alternatives to violent dispute resolution.

7 Developing, expanding and improving rehabilitation and reentry programming. In the state of Washington, the legislature passed a law requiring that prison programming be “evidence-based,” that is, proven to help reduce recidivism. This approach, while not always legislated, is being embraced by many other states as they look for approaches that “work” rather than waste money – or even increase recidivism.

8 Addressing the lifetime consequences of criminal records. As new laws made more kinds of actions criminal and introduced more and more people to the criminal justice system, a parallel set of new laws served to impose permanent, ceaseless punishments on people with criminal records.

While a criminal record normally creates a social stigma, these laws actually formalize the stigmatization by burdening returning citizens with special restrictions. Many rights and privileges taken for granted by those without a criminal record are abridged for returning citizens because lawmakers assume that they present further risks to society.

In Florida, a task force appointed by Governor Jeb Bush in 2005 found that at least 40 percent of the jobs in the Florida economy – both public and private – were affected by a wily patchwork of incomprehensible state-created employment restrictions.

Across the country, literally thousands of laws have been enacted that bar employment and professional licensure to people with criminal records. Others restrict what kind of jobs and what kind of places one may work. These laws, often called “the collateral consequences” of a criminal record, also restrict driver’s licenses, public housing and other public benefits, adoption and foster parenting, fishing and hunting, student loans and, perhaps most famously or notoriously, VOTING.

Some people think the entire sentence is delivered when the judge bangs his gavel at the close of the case. Those of us working with returning citizens know better.

States and localities are moving to lift these restrictions. In Florida now, a number of licensing boards no longer require that applicants with felony convictions who are seeking occupational licenses first get their civil rights restored (a multi-year, sometimes lifetime, cumbersome process in that state).

Various municipalities, including Boston and San Francisco, have “banned the box” on applications for city jobs. While criminal records are eventually considered, the applicant is not locked out from the start– the “have you been convicted?” Yes-No box on the application has been removed.

In some jurisdictions, laws are being passed that allow returning citizens to get the barriers removed by showing that they have been rehabilitated. These laws allow people to seek waivers, exemptions, or certificates of relief from the disqualifications. Some states are revising disqualifications so that instead of lasting a lifetime, they now expire after a certain amount of time.

“What Baptists should do”

Baptists are calling for change. Wendell L. Griffen, an appellate judge in Arkansas, speaking in his capacity as the coordinator of ministries at Mount Pleasant Baptist Church, offered the following observations at the New Baptist Covenant Celebration in January 2008:

1. Baptists must reject the wicked notion that incarceration is just for so many people. The tendency to engage in unlawful behavior is not racially identifiable. However, Baptists have yet to challenge racial profiling by law enforcement officials who target black and brown communities.
2. Regarding violent crime, Baptists must repent of the sin of selective judgment about who deserves policing, and who should be considered victims. In recent years, racial profiling has taken on a false respectability due to fears about terrorist attacks and anxieties about immigration. Yet, Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols, two white men born in the United States, conspired to bomb a federal building in Oklahoma, killing hundreds of men, women, and children. There was no increased policing of white neighborhoods after the Oklahoma City bombing. Black people were lynched in communities across this country, or were threatened with lynching by white men, for many years. Black, brown, and red women were sexually assaulted with impunity for decades with no suggestion that white men and neighborhoods deserved heightened police patrols.
3. Baptists should condemn, in the name of our just God, that our neighbors have been interrogated, humiliated, accused, denied access to their families, denied access to the evidence on which the government relies on to accuse them, and tortured after first being profiled by our government. Few Baptist pastors and congregations denounced the demonization and profiling of persons of South Asian ethnicity and Islamic faith who have been incarcerated by the federal government at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Many of the detainees have never been charged with any crimes.

... and what does the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God? Micah 6:8(b), KJV

... Lord, when saw we thee ... in prison, and did not minister unto thee?... Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me. Matthew 25:44-45 (excerpted), KJV

Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves? And he said, He that shewed mercy on him. Then said Jesus unto him, Go, and do thou likewise. Luke 10:36-37 (KJV)

4. Baptists should condemn the idea that incarceration cures crime! No rational or morally responsible person would publicly advocate hiring more morticians and building more cemeteries to treat cancer or AIDS. Yet, Baptists routinely accept the equally reprehensible idea that it is just to hire more jailers, police officers, and build more jails and prisons to address the problem of non-violent repeat drug offenders and others who are afflicted by similarly preventable and treatable maladies.
5. Baptists should elevate the public policy conversation about criminal justice. Why are so many people turning to illegal drugs to obtain a sense of personal fulfillment? What are our congregations doing, and what public policies are advocated, to assist parents and families and to improve early childhood health care and education, so that people are not so susceptible to drugs and alcohol, materialism, and violence? Why is it somehow just to license products and activities that incite people to trivialize violence, if not glorify it, when we punish people for doing what we have licensed and trivialized?
6. Baptists must confront and condemn the privatization of criminal justice. Criminal justice, like national defense, is public work to be done in the name of public health, safety, and prosperity. We should not outsource that work to enrich private parties while refusing to see what the vendors do to and with our brothers and sisters who have fallen along life's road.
7. Baptists should demand that people who administer our criminal justice system be culturally competent and respect the dignity of every person. Certainly, we must protect the world from the violent, vicious, and dishonest. We should not treat any person, however heinous the conduct may be that he or she is accused of doing, as beneath humanity.
8. Baptists must insist that society invest in reclamation efforts with persons who have been convicted of criminal behavior, to the fullest practicable extent. Eventually, most of the two million people in our jails and prisons will be released. Their condition and future upon release largely depends on what we do with and to them, and their families and communities, during incarceration.
9. Baptists should demand that criminal justice be free of false evidence, wrongful convictions, and retribution. Nothing is more unjust than to accuse, convict, and punish someone based on contrived, falsified, or pernicious grounds. We who grieve that Jesus was tried in a prejudiced forum, charged by an overzealous prosecutor, and convicted based on falsified proof, should be the first to demand transparency and integrity in the criminal justice process at every stage.

Judge Griffen closed by pointing out, “We are not neighbors, yet to our fellow humans who have been somehow beaten, robbed, and left along the road of life by the system that polices, arrests, prosecutes, adjudicates, incarcerates, releases, and recycles people in what we call criminal justice.”

We can become neighbors. This work will help build the neighborhood.

Afterword

Help us God to forgive the blood that has stained many hands, the bruises that have hurt many bodies, and the ruins that have come to many families. In the midst of all that has plagued our communities and challenged our families and faith, it is our heart's desire to be healed. As we desire to be healed, we want the scales of justice to balance while the grace of God prevails. We want love to be released and healing to come to our communities. We are now moving towards a Healing Community.

FAQs

Family Freedom Kit Frequently Asked Questions

What is the purpose of this Family Freedom Kit?

It is to help churches learn how they can minister to members of their own congregations who are caught up in the criminal justice system (both the accused and victims) and to the families of those individuals.

Why is this manual called a “Family Freedom” kit?

The kit is offered as a resource to encourage, enlighten, educate, energize, and empower church members to help free families from the isolation, pain, stigma, shame, and self-incarceration that often afflict families entangled in the criminal justice system. The Good Shepherd has already created a complete Table of Freedom. The table is set.

The manual encourages us to create “Healing Communities.” What is a Healing Community?

Churches are familiar with prison ministries, and more recently with the phenomenon of prisoner reentry, which reflects the simple fact that most inmates do return to society. Healing Communities go further than either. A Healing Community strives to restore relationships between returning citizens and their families, communities, the larger society and, where possible, the victims of their criminal behavior. At the center of a Healing Community are Stations of Hope.

What is a “Returning Citizen?”

A returning citizen is a person coming home from jail or prison – what some, but not we, might call “ex-cons” or “ex-offenders.” The emphasis is on what one is rather than what one was. This is where our civil rights focus comes in. The term “returning citizen” emphasizes that the civil rights of those who have paid their debt to society should be recognized. That also means working to change laws that, for example, restrict voting rights or deny job opportunities to returning citizens.

What is a “Station of Hope?”

“Stations of Hope” are churches that offer refuges of healing and centers of teaching – a renewed vision for returning citizens, their families and communities.

Why should we get involved in this kind of ministry?

We are called to serve “the least of these,” which most definitely includes people who are facing charges, enduring incarceration, and coming home from prison. We are called to serve their suffering families. And we are called to serve the victims of crime. (See Chapter Two.)

Are you suggesting that we set-up a prison ministry program?

No, we are only suggesting you fulfill the duty that the church is called to do (Matthew 25:43-45) and reach out and support the people in your own congregation facing these challenges.

Do we need to establish a 501(c)(3) nonprofit to do this?

NO! We are not suggesting a program at all – rather, ministry. Think about how your church reaches out to people who are hospitalized or sick. You don’t need a “program” to do that. You don’t need a program to do this work, either!

Do we need to raise funds to do this work?

NO! You don’t need to raise money to create a Healing Community. Government and charitable funding for work with prisoners and returning citizens is extremely limited. We are hoping to build upon good but underfunded programs to help those in your congregation by starting with what we have -- the strength and commitment to build Stations of Hope -- and not relying on a program strategy.

What does our church need to do to get ready to do this work?

Start by learning about the criminal justice system (Chapter Two). Study what the Bible says about crime and incarceration, especially the imprisonment of the prophets. Reach out to your neighbors in your church who are affected by crime or incarceration and let them know they are supported and loved.

How do we get started?

Pastors and other church leaders will make it clear that their churches will become Stations of Hope that welcome and help individuals in the congregation, and their family members, when the individuals are arrested, in jail or prison or coming home as returning citizens. (See Chapter Three.)

Who can do this work?

Any church can; every church should!!

What if we are a very small congregation, can we still do this work?

Any church can; every church should!! You can visit family members whose loved ones are involved in the criminal justice system. You can mentor a child or family. You can attend the criminal trial of a member of your congregation. Your Christian witness will help reduce the stigma and pain others are experiencing. Really, with a little imagination, there is no limit to what you can do.

Sample Responsive Reading to Introduce “Healing Communities” to the Congregation

By Rev. Dr. Allyson Abrams

Leader: O God, creator of heaven and earth, you are our redeemer, our strength and our hope.

People: I was sick and you visited me with help and ministering care, I was in prison and you came to see me. Thank you for your healing power.

Leader: God, you are greater than the marginalization thrust on us by organized forces and institutionalized agencies. You are omnipotent and able to do anything but fail.

People: I was sick and you visited me with help and ministering care, I was in prison and you came to see me. Thank you for your deliverance power.

Leader: God, we cry out to you today and stand in the gap for those who have been disenfranchised and victimized at the hands of others. We trust you to bring about a change in all of our lives.

People: I was sick and you visited me with help and ministering care, I was in prison and you came to see me. Thank you for your restorative power.

Leader: We ask for healing for those who have lost loved ones at the hands of others; healing for those who are behind jail and prison bars; and healing for those in the communities that will struggle to embrace them upon their return.

People: I was sick and you visited me with help and ministering care, I was in prison and you came to see me. Thank you for your reconciling power.

Leader: Almighty God, help us to love, forgive, reach out, and open doors to all whom you send our way – as well as to those who have yet to realize that they need our help. Lead us and guide us each and every day.

People: I was sick and you visited me with help and ministering care, I was in prison and you came to see me. Thank you for your transformative power.

ALL: Help us God to forgive the blood that has stained many hands, the bruises that have hurt many bodies, and the ruins that have come to many families. In the midst of all that has plagued our communities and challenged our families and faith, it is our heart’s desire to be healed. As we desire to be healed, we want the scales of justice to balance while the grace of God prevails. We want love to be released and healing to come to our communities. We are now moving towards a Healing Community.

Appendix D Criminal Justice System Flowchart

What is the sequence of events in the criminal justice system?

Source: Adapted from The challenge of crime in a free society. President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, 1967. This revision, a result of the Symposium on the 30th Anniversary of the President's Commission, was prepared by the Bureau of Justice Statistics in 1987.

Note: This chart gives a simplified view of caseload through the criminal justice system. Procedures vary among jurisdictions. The weights of the lines are not intended to show actual size of caseloads.

Obstacles to Successful Reintegration into the Community

44% of re-arrests for new crimes and/or parole violations occur within 1 year after release.

The following are a list of obstacles your mentee may have to overcome. As a mentor you are not expected to have solutions to these problems but it is helpful for you to have some insight into some of the frustrating circumstances your mentee may face.

Unfortunately, there are no easy solutions for many of these. As the mentor, the greatest way you can assist your mentee is to encourage them to persevere with a stick-to-itiveness attitude as they face and work through these obstacles.

□ Socially paralyzed

The term used is “institutionalized.”

Signs of institutionalization are marked when the person:

- Accepts the terms of the jail/prison environment as their environment (this is different than making the best of a situation).
- Functions more easily in prison than out.
- Feels more like their self while in prison than out.
- Has learned to be dependent and loses the ability to make choices on their own.
- Commits crimes in order to be sent back to jail.
- Is fearful in traffic, using new technologies and around unfamiliar people and places.

□ Lack of appropriate identification

Identity cards are critical for getting a job, cashing a check, signing a lease and getting on a plane. Since 9/11, identity cards are more important than ever and the rules to obtain them are stricter. The key cards are:

- Photo Identification (driver license, state ID, passport)
- Birth Certificate
- Social Security Card

□ Lack of education and job training

Typically, the average inmate reads from a 4th to 8th grade level and has few marketable skills. Few have graduated from high school.

☐ Little to no money

- People earn little or no money in prison. The few who do have prison jobs typically earn very little; in federal prisons, the inmates earn 19 cents an hour for prison maintenance chores. From these wages, deductions are made for restitution, fees, costs and child support.
- The money provided upon release is very little – depending on the state, from $50 to $200.

☐ Debilitating debt.

With no money coming in, debts can accrue and grow to enormous sums while a person is in prison. Debts accrue from child support orders not being modified while in prison and from the imposition of court fines, costs and fees; restitution to the victim; and unpaid debts accumulating interest and fines.

☐ Lack of Housing

- Family members may not be welcoming the person back into their homes.
- Public and Section 8 housing is not always available to those with criminal records.
- Private landlords are often reluctant to rent to people with criminal records.
- Rents are not affordable by people just starting to work.
- Shelters are often full and unavailable.
- States, counties and cities have created severe restrictions on where people with a past sex offense may reside.

☐ Lack of a job

The inability to find and keep a job immediately after release is strongly associated with being re-incarcerated. Some of the reasons for not being able to find and keep a job are:

- States have created thousands of job restrictions based on criminal records.
- Even employers who may legally hire people with records are afraid to do so.
- Little or no employment history.
- Few soft (for instance, interpersonal) or hard (technical) work skills.
- Lack of identity papers, such as a state driver license or Social Security Card.
- Parole stipulations that require being at appointments during working hours.
- Lack of transportation.
- Fear and “institutionalization.”
- Untreated addiction, health and mental health problems.

☐ Addiction

This is both an internal and external obstacle as it not only involves the addiction but the lifestyle of addiction, which affects every area of life including all of those listed above. Treatment may have to precede employment, or at the very least, be done simultaneously.

☐ Poor family relationships

- Parental rights may have been lost.
- Families are strained because of the length of separation.
- Men entering the home have a difficult time reestablishing their role in the home.
- The person and/or their family members are holding anger, resentment and blame for years of hurts.
- Family members may have been direct or indirect victims of the returning citizens crimes or other forms of misconduct.

☐ Lack of medical care, insurance & benefits

Many entered jail with, or are exposed to Hepatitis C, AIDS/HIV, tuberculosis, and bacterial infections as well as mental health issues that require ongoing treatment and/or medication.

☐ STIGMA: Being Labeled

- The label of “ex-offender” marks the person and is a constant reminder of past choices. Even as we change the language to “returning citizen” the stigma persists.
- Being labeled along with all of the other obstacles can lead to negative thoughts such as, I am no good, they’re right—I’m never going to make, It’s too hard, I can’t ever get a break. This can lead to feelings of anxiety, frustration, hopelessness, depression, anger, and loneliness. If the negative thoughts and feelings are left unchecked, then the person can very quickly fall back into destructive behavior that will only lead to more trouble.

Qualifications for Mentors

Mentors are coaches, and some even call themselves coaches. Like coaches in sports, mentors inspire, guide, support and nurture others. In education, business, law, sports, the arts, medicine and other professions, mentoring relationships are considered important to the success of the mentee (or protégé). Often, but not always, mentors are older than their mentees. Mentees are NOT always children, young people or people just starting their careers.

Mentoring relationships can be relatively short term – a year or two – or last a lifetime.

Some famous mentoring relationships have included: Socrates and Plato, Plato and Aristotle, Aristotle and Alexander the Great, Paul of Tarsus and Timothy, Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot, and Benjamin Mays (president of Morehouse College) and Martin Luther King, Jr.

A Mentor of a prisoner, returning citizen, crime victim or their family members must:

- Be nonjudgmental, positive, nurturing, supportive, honest, trustworthy, reliable and consistent.
- Maintain confidential communications. Not gossip.
- Maintain boundaries with the mentee.
- Refrain from asking questions out of personal curiosity but only to further the growth of the mentee and your relationship.
- Have a commitment to the growth and success of the mentee.
- Coordinate the mentoring relationship through your faith community and be a part of that community.
- Be accountable to the mentee and the faith community and hold the mentee accountable.
- Have a genuine concern for those who are or have been previously incarcerated, their families and victims.
- Have the ability to encourage and be supportive without creating a dependent relationship.
- Apply the same principles and standards presented to the mentee as standards to your own life.
- Ask for help when confronted with situations beyond your own resources or expertise.
- Be free from drug and/or alcohol addiction.

Understand and empathize with the challenges of the mentee without letting them become excuses.

The Do's & Don'ts of Mentoring

The following do's and don'ts are a guide to help you effectively help your mentee.

As a mentor, do:

1. Be yourself

You are coming alongside a person who is looking for a new direction, a new perspective and a new way of doing life. The greatest value you bring to the mentoring relationship is yourself, your faith and your willingness to share from your own life experiences.

2. Speak truth in love

The balance of truth and love is essential. Be aware of your own strengths and weaknesses in this area. In an effort to set someone straight, do you tend to blurt out the truth? Or, in an effort to be loving, do you tend to avoid saying anything? If you tend to be a "truth teller" you will need to be mindful of how you share. The truth must be tempered with compassion. Truth in love is not always efficient but it is always effective.

If you tend to be kind so as to not hurt other's feelings you will need to be mindful of what you share. Kindness must be rooted in truth. Love with truth is not always comfortable but it is always beneficial.

3. Act as a friend.

Make sure your relational approach is one of being a friend and not a parent, teacher or supervisor. There will be teaching times, and there will be times where you will need to hold your mentee accountable. Make sure that even in those times you are ultimately being a truthful loving friend.

4. Use wisdom and be innocent.

Use wisdom to avoid being manipulated or drawn into any unhealthy and/or unsafe dealings with your mentee. Review the information in this manual and when in doubt contact the mentor coordinator. Innocent does not mean naive. Being innocent means to be guarded against falling into the same negative behaviors as your mentee. In combination with wisdom this is not license to be self-righteous and condemning, but an opportunity to be a positive influence. An example would be the tendency to argue. If your mentee has that tendency then you will need to use wisdom to guard against getting caught up in useless arguments and gently help the mentee learn how to do the same.

5. Be a good listener.

This sounds simple but all of us can struggle with really listening. We can all tend to be easily distracted especially with all of the new technology we have. Here are a few basics:

- Avoid formulating a response while the other person is talking.
- Ask questions for clarity.
- Avoid talking before the other person is finished.
- Maintain eye contact.
- Be aware of body language and emotions behind the spoken words.
- Unless you are waiting for an important call, put your cell phone on vibrate and do not answer calls while meeting with your mentee.
- Don't feel like you have to be the answer person.

6. Treat your mentee as you would want to be treated.

Take time to listen and put yourself into your mentee's shoes. But always remember that when you attempt to stand in another's shoes, you must stand in their shoes and not your own. That means understanding the fullness of their life experiences. It does not mean thinking they should do what you would do, given your life experiences, if you had the same choices to make.

There may be the temptation to be more curious about what they did than concerned about the person. Make sure you meet your mentee having a concern for their well-being rather than curiosity about their past doings.

7. Be adequately prepared and on time for any meetings or outings.

Again, you are an example.

8. Decide with mentee what they need to work on—not for the mentee.

The mentee needs to take ownership of those areas of their life they need to work on. If you tell them what they need to work on without their input they will be more apt to blame you when they fail. It is possible (especially if your mentee has served a lot of time) that your mentee is used to someone telling him/her what to do. They might have a history of rebelling and blaming, but have also become comfortable with others telling them what to do. This dependence prevents them from taking responsibility for their own choices and behavior. HELP set goals; don't set goals for the individual.

9. Help mentee make decisions on their own

When faced with choices it is an opportunity to help your mentee see both sides and work through making the decision. Remind your mentee of the principle: choosing not to make a decision is to choose to live with the consequences of indecisiveness.

10. Be free to say “no.”

If you are interested in mentoring, there is a good chance that you are a “people helper” and want to be a help whenever and however you can. You will do yourself, your family and your mentee a great disservice if you don’t exercise the freedom to say “no.” It is okay to say, “let me get back to you,” if the situation allows for a delayed response. It is easier to undo a “no” response versus a “yes” response. Don’t give in to pressure to respond immediately.

11. Pray

This is the last “do” but certainly not the least. Pray for your mentee. Make it a habit to ask what you can be praying for and follow up with what they shared. Also pray for wisdom for yourself—you will need it. As an encouragement to your mentee you may want to keep journal so that both of you can be reminded of how his faith helped in the past especially during difficult times.

As a mentor, do NOT:

1. Put hopes in release dates.

If you are mentoring a prisoner, you want to encourage your mentee during their incarceration but not by giving false hope. One reason is that unfortunately their release date is subject to change as a result of his/her own behavior or administrative decisions. Another reason is that the future is an unknown but when we rest on our faith, we can rest in knowing that we will get through—this is the hope in which you want to encourage your mentee.

2. Call wives/husbands, girlfriends/boyfriends on behalf of mentee.

If you are following the “Do’s” this will not be an issue for you. You want to encourage your mentee to reconcile with their family members when possible and when beneficial but your role is not to be a mediator for your mentee especially while they are incarcerated. If they insist that they need to get information to a family member you can suggest that they make the request to the chaplain.

3. Give contraband to inmates—gum, pens, books, etc.

This is a prison rule. If you are not sure, don’t give it. In some prisons, certain items may be approved and given to the inmate by the correctional officer at the front desk but not always. Many prisons only allow you to enter with a car key, some change for the vending machines and your ID. And many prisons require books to be sent by the publisher or on-line book sellers like Amazon.

4. Make promises you can’t keep.

Know your limitations. Don’t commit yourself or anyone else to do anything that you are not sure is possible. Chances are your mentee has experienced the pain of many broken promises either their own or another’s. You will build confidence in the relationship if you avoid making promises you can’t keep.

5. Give legal advice.

You can share any past experiences that you have had but make sure the process and the outcome is presented as your experience and not as a representation of the way things are done.

6. Side with mentee against authority or bad-mouth the system.

No system is perfect and things are going to happen. When your mentee has a conflict with authority it is an opportunity to encourage them in a new attitude and perspective on authority. Even if there was an injustice, you can share the proper way to respond that will bring peace to your mentee rather than more trouble.

7. Bad-mouth other groups.

There are a variety of groups that go into the prison and are available to help with the various issues that prisoners face. Be careful not to allow your own biases to cloud your conversations with your mentee. Instead be respectful of the religious and ideologies of other groups and organizations.

8. Share information about other mentees or inmates.

If you have more than one mentoring relationship there is the possibility that your mentees may know each other. If that information is discovered be very careful not to share information about either of them. This is critical in building trust.

9. Enter into business dealings with mentee.

Your mentee may be extremely intelligent and highly talented but entering into business dealings will add facets to the relationship that are not beneficial and can undermine the purpose of the mentoring.

10. Push the mentee to give their testimony.

It can be very exciting to watch someone turn their life around but it is best to let someone practice their new life choices over a long period of time before “going public.” Often times mentee’s decision to practice changed attitudes and choices in the many areas of life will speak volumes to a watching world. One year is a good practice time before publicly sharing a testimony.

11. Major on the minors.

There will most likely be many areas of your mentee’s life that are not ideal. There will be areas that you would easily declare to be off limits according to what you know to be true but to try to attack all of those areas up front would be futile. By helping your mentee learn how to, by faith, have right thinking, and make good choices, those areas will begin to change for the good.

12. Feel like you have to have all of the answers.

You do not have all of the answers. Your willingness to be available, to be an encouragement and to help is invaluable. If you are in need of guidance or information, contact your faith leader for help.

Working with Victims and Returning Citizens: Participant Issues

Working with participants—victims, returning citizens, and supporters—in a restorative process can be difficult. Each person brings his/her own experience and emotions to the process. These can range from anger and pain to shame and guilt. It is important to be sensitive to and respectful of the needs of these individuals. This issue of Focus on Justice provides some principles for working with participants in a restorative process.

1. Victims need to vent and share their feelings about the crime

After a crime, victims need to tell their stories and express their emotions. At the same time, they need to feel that they have been heard. When meeting with them to prepare for the restorative encounter, it can be difficult to listen to the victims' stories and comments about the returning citizen. At this point, the victim just needs a compassionate, non-judgmental ear to listen to their feelings and concerns.

When the victim is ready, you can explain the process and answer their questions. Some useful questions to include in a preparation meeting are:

- Can you tell us what happened?
- How did you feel at the time?
- How has this impacted you?
- What has been the hardest thing for you?
 - If the returning citizen were here, what would you like to say to him?

2. Returning citizens need to vent and share their feelings about the crime

It is important to listen to returning citizens tell their own stories, both of the crime and of its aftermath. They will have questions about the process, how it benefits them, and how they will be treated in the meeting. They will be dealing with issues of shame and remorse that could lead to belligerence and denial of responsibility that will be challenged by a restorative encounter process.

Meetings with the returning citizens often reveal attitudes that can be problematic in moving toward a meeting between them and the victims. This could include minimizing the amount of harm done, taking a victim stance, blaming others, or refusal to acknowledge needs of victims. Remember to accept them as they are at the moment and not get hooked by different attitudes.

Useful questions for the preparation meeting include:

- Can you tell us what happened?
- What were you thinking at the time?

- What have you been thinking since then?
- How has this affected you?
- Who else has been affected? How?
- What would you do differently in the future?

3. Even skeptical parties can participate as long as they understand and accept the process

Preparation meetings with victims and returning citizens can reveal attitudes and emotions that are harsh and uncomfortable. However, these do not have to stop you from organizing a restorative encounter. Each case will be different and it is important to evaluate each one separately. If there is some acceptance that he/she has done harm then an encounter with the victim could be helpful. If an angry victim is willing to respectfully speak with the returning citizen, then the process can help him/her in working through these emotions. Remember to let the parties determine if they want to move forward.

4. Don't forget the support people In these encounters, support people for either the victim or the returning citizen can play an important role. Their stories help develop common understanding of what happened and the crime's impact on all involved. At the same time, support people need preparation as much as the other participants. This includes an explanation of the process, steps in the program and possible outcomes. Support people will also need to tell their stories and have questions answered.

5. Let the parties make their own decisions

The encounter processes is not restorative justice. Restorative justice is a way of seeing crime as harm done to people and relationships and justice is done when that harm is addressed. The best way of addressing that harm is allowing those impacted to have a voice in the response. This is the purpose of the encounter process.

Just as the victim has the opportunity to decline participation, there are other decisions that are important for them to make. This could mean telling the victim about the returning citizen's attitude and the possibility of hurt in the encounter meeting and letting the victim decide about moving forward. This also means allowing the parties to decide on an agreement for repairing the harm instead of imposing ideas on them.

Appendix I

Working with Victims and Returning Citizens: Process Issues

It can seem intimidating to facilitate restorative encounters between victims and returning citizens. However, there are some relatively simple principles that will increase the likelihood that the experience will be positive for all involved. This fact sheet will explore principles related to the restorative process, and the next issue will address issues related to the participants themselves.

1. Preparation of parties is key to a successful restorative process.

By having individual meetings with participants before the actual encounter meeting, you give yourself the opportunity to build rapport and a level of trust with each person who will be there. You will explain the process and look for any obstacles they face in participating in the restorative process. This also gives them the opportunity to ask questions, to think about what they want to say to the other party and to begin considering about ways to repair the harm. This is a time when you can deal with unrealistic expectations the parties may have—such as when victims assume that there will be deep remorse from returning citizens, or returning citizens expect that the victim will forgive. Unrealistic expectations can turn what would otherwise be a good experience into a bad one simply because the participants anticipated more than was reasonable.

2. Don't take it personally if victims are angry or upset.

Victims have suffered trauma through the crime and the criminal justice process. The anger and pain arising from such trauma can be directed toward the facilitator in the restorative justice process. The victim may link you with the offense, the returning citizen or the justice system. The best response is to remember that this anger is not personal and listen to the victims. If possible, direct the anger to the appropriate person or agency responsible. Honest, transparent and compassionate treatment will help to build the relationship with the victim.

3. Use caution in defining successful outcomes.

The way you define success can impact how you treat parties in a restorative process. If the focus is on completed meetings between victims and returning citizens then it is possible to coerce parties to participate in the process when they are uncomfortable with it. If success means forgiveness or reconciliation, then it's possible to push parties toward these outcomes before they are ready. In either case, the definition of success could lead to behavior that could harm the participants.

For a facilitator in a restorative process, success is providing a safe place—both physically and emotionally—for all participants to tell their stories, listen to the stories of others, dialogue about the impact of the crime and decide on steps for moving forward.

4. Never assume that participants automatically understand the process.

The restorative justice process will be very new to the victims and returning citizen. For this reason it is important to be open and supportive of parties considering participation. Let them know the purpose of preparation meetings and that the other party will not be present. Explain each step of the process from scheduling to the actual encounter meeting to the follow-up.

5. Be prepared to develop alternatives

One process does not fit all individuals. Victims may choose not to participate in a direct encounter but want some input or need other services. It is important to be open to the needs of the victims at this time and to help them find the kind of help they need.

As for the restorative encounter, victims could write letters explaining the impact of the crime or send a representative. If a victim doesn't wish to participate at all, the returning citizen can meet with a community representative to discuss the impact of the crime on the community and ways of repairing the harm. For victims wishing to participate in a restorative encounter when the returning citizen is not available, a meeting with another returning citizen can provide an opportunity for discussing the harm, as happens in the Sycamore Tree Project®.

Crime's Impact on Victims

Crimes cause crises that remove victims from their normal range of experiences and challenge their coping mechanisms. The realization that they cannot control what happens to them can shatter victims' sense of safety and security. This trauma can touch many areas of victims' lives. Understanding the impact of crime on victims is important preparation for working with them, for helping offenders understand the impact of their actions, and for ministering to prisoners and other people who have themselves been victims of crime. There are at least seven ways in which crime impacts victims: Physical Many victims have to deal with bodily injuries inflicted during the crime. Tending to those injuries is one way that we love our neighbor. However, there may also be less obvious physical symptoms resulting from trauma. These include nightmares, changed sleep patterns, fatigue, impotence, weight change, chemical dependency, and an exaggerated startle response. Mental Some of the after-effects of crime include an inability to concentrate and the experience of flashbacks of the offence. The crimes' assault on the victims' sense of security and self-control may cause them to struggle to make sense of their world. They may question levels of safety and crime in society, struggle with issues of self-blame and failure and develop a negative self-identity. This is a normal part of the process of coming to terms with what happened, and with help, the victims can regain self-control and dignity, and emerge with a more realistic but positive understanding of the world and of their place in it. Spiritual Because crime raises questions about victims' fundamental beliefs, it often leads to a spiritual crisis. The understanding and supportive response of members of the faith community can help victims turn the crisis into an occasion for strengthening and maturing their faith. Insensitivity and unthinking comments by the faith community can intensify the faith crisis and the sense of inappropriate guilt, making it more difficult for victims to cope.	Emotional Not all victims react to crime in the same way, and individual victim's responses will change over time. Victims face issues of grief for what was lost in the crime. They may suffer feelings of guilt and shame, and experience loneliness, depression, sadness, fear, self-pity and helplessness. This can result in withdrawal from others and may even lead to acts of revenge. Interpersonal Crime affects not only the victims, but also their relationships with families and friends. The result can include divorce, reduced parenting skills and disconnection from social and family networks. There is greater risk of domestic violence and chemical dependency. In addition, relatives and friends of crime victims may hold unrealistic expectations of how the victims should respond, leading to blame and rejection. Financial The financial costs of crime arise from lost or damaged property, medical and psychological treatment, lost income, and the requirement to participate in judicial proceedings. Furthermore, victims make lifestyle changes in response to the crime which may include investing more resources into personal security. Vocational Victims may experience a change in their work habits. They may have difficulty functioning at their previous level due to the emotional and mental repercussions. Some victims become workaholics as they withdraw from social and family networks. Each crime victim and situation is unique. Past trauma, the existence of good support networks, and the availability of needed resources all affect the ability of victims to cope. A supportive family, congregation and community are instrumental in helping victims work through the various impacts of crime. This fact sheet is drawn from that of Prison Fellowship International. Ties that Bind:

Supporting Families When a Member is Arrested, Incarcerated, or Coming Home from Prison

As you learn of members of your congregation – or members of their families - being arrested, incarcerated, or coming home from prison, reach out to them and let them know your faith community stands with them and their loved one.

GENERAL TIPS:

- Call and visit the family members. Tell them they are welcome in the congregation and that it stands ready to support them. Let the family know that you are concerned about their well-being and the well-being of their loved one.
- Ask if the family thinks it would be helpful if you met, visited with, or wrote to their loved one. If so, do so!
- Discreetly ask how the family is doing financially. Has the arrest, trial, or incarceration of their loved one caused financial distress? If the family does need financial help, steer them to government and charitable resources that can help them.
- Build a mentoring relationship with the family, especially the children.
- Help the family build or sustain a relationship with their loved one.

AT THE TIME OF ARREST, INVESTIGATION, AND TRIAL OR SENTENCING:

- Offer to be present at the defendant's court appearances.
- Help the defendant in preparing for his legal defense or sentencing.

DURING THE PERIOD OF INCARCERATION:

- Assist the family with transportation to jail or prison when needed, which might include an offer to drive the family to see the prisoner.
- Introduce yourself and work with the jail chaplain.
- Find out about the correspondence, telephoning, and visiting rules.
- Write letters and offer to accept phone calls.
- Visit the person.
- Hold the prisoner accountable for what he has done.

- Forgive him. And encourage his forgiveness of himself.
- Help resolve problems, disputes, and complaints regarding jail and prison conditions and other problems.
- Identify supportive resources (e.g., education, training, treatment) in the prison and in the communities neighboring the prison.
- Guide and help the recovery of the crime victim and the family of the victim.
- Begin the process of reconciliation – with family, the faith and larger communities, and the victim, is appropriate.

PREPARING FOR RELEASE FROM PRISON:

- Help in the preparation of a discharge plan.
- Help establish realistic expectations.
- Help prepare for community supervision (e.g., parole).
- Address the issue of residency prior to release.
- Address the issue of post-release employment.
- Start building a circle of peer support.
- Identify people who can respond 24/7 to crises.
- Work with prison officials to be clear on date and time of discharge so you can meet the returning citizen at the gate (or bus station) and take him home.
- Involve the family in preparing for the return home.

RETURNING HOME:

- Welcome the returning citizen back into the congregation and community.
- Introduce the returning citizen to the circle of peer support.
- Provide close support, especially for the first 72 hours after release.
- Continue the work of reconciliation and help develop a restitution plan.
- Help the returning citizen find and keep a job.
- Help the returning citizen maintain sobriety.
- Help the returning citizen find and keep permanent housing.
- Help the returning citizen abide by the terms of parole or probation, if any.
- Involve the returning citizen in the church's ministry work.

Ties that Bind:

Keeping the Family Together When a Member is Incarcerated

Bear One Another's Burdens

Drawing on the strengths of your family...

- Know this: YOU ARE NOT ALONE. We are offering you a network of caring, loving people supporting your family.
 - Let your faith leader and congregation know what your family needs – emotionally, financially – whatever the needs might be.
 - Get to know the prison chaplain. He or she can be a link between the family and your loved one.
 - Write letters to your loved one to let them know you care about them.
 - Call your loved one whenever financially possible.
 - Remember special dates, such as birthdays, and send cards to show you love and support them. Send pictures of family activities and events. Pictures of sports games, family activities or school functions work well. Encourage children to write a story about the activity to accompany the pictures.
 - When major decisions face the family, seek your loved one's perspective on the issue.
- Visit as often as possible. Your family visits will help keep your loved one and the entire family grounded.
 - Talk about your loved one to the children so that the parent remains important in their lives.

- Let your loved one know about gift-giving programs, such as Prison Fellowship's AngelTree® program.
- Encourage your loved one's extended family (brothers, sisters, aunts, uncles, cousins, grandparents, etc.) to write and call frequently. Staying in touch reminds those who are incarcerated that they are loved and reminds them of their ties to the community to which they will return.

Specifically for children. . .

- Encourage the child to color and send pictures (age appropriate).
- Encourage the child to keep a journal. This journal could contain everyday things that they would like to discuss with their parent. On phone call day(s) pick out the most important issues to discuss. If you run out of time you can continue the conversation in a letter.
- Send holiday cards that the child has made. Encourage children to acknowledge their parent's special days, such as like birthdays.
- Send the child's report cards, graded test scores, and homework.
- If a child is assigned to read a certain book in school, try to get a copy to the incarcerated parent so they can read the book as well. Discuss the book with them.
- Find out if the prison has facilities for video-conferencing between parents and children. If not, talk to the chaplain about setting up such a system.
